

them within the reach of every one disposed to cultivate these beautiful flowers.

Healthful employment for ladies.—Experience has demonstrated beyond all possible contradiction, that exercise in open air is absolutely necessary to the enjoyment of perfect health. Why is it that English ladies are more healthy and bear their years better than those of our own country? It is believed that this results wholly from their different manner of living. English ladies take much exercise on horseback, and superintend personally the management of their yards and gardens. They do not disdain to exercise themselves occasionally in sowing seeds, nursing plants, and destroying weeds. If ornamental ladies would follow their example the coming spring, moderately and prudently, they would probably derive much benefit from it—their cheeks would give place to the hue of health—and pills and cosmetics could remain at the apothecary's. Husbands and fathers could not practice better economy—could not in a more effectual way promote the social virtues—making home sweet and dear—than by sitting up for the females of the family tasteful flower gardens, and furnishing them with seeds, flower roots, trees and shrubbery, to ornament and improve them. Gentlemen would do well to try this specific. They would soon witness its effects. Instead of lassitude, they would see vigor, industry, usefulness, contentment, and health.

Silk—Cocoons.—We are desired by a lady to ask of the printers with whom we exchange, if they know where there is a cocoon in the western country, and if they do, what prices are paid for them? A note inserted in their papers, in reply to these inquiries, would be thankfully received. We are given to understand that a good many cocoons would be raised in this vicinity, if a market could be found for them.

In answer to the above we would state that a good market could be found in Nauvoo for Cocoons as we have a great many silk spinners, weavers, dyers &c. in our city, who have emigrated from the silk manufacturing districts in England; who are acquainted with the manufacture of silk in all its branches, and it is contemplated to make a commencement of the manufacture of silks as soon as suitable arrangements can be made.

We are not prepared to say what price could or would be given, as we are not informed on this subject, we can however inform ourselves and may then make it known; in the mean time we would say that as good a price could be obtained for it in Nauvoo, as elsewhere; and that would be in the "solid," and this we think that even our whig friends would not object to take.

Currents.—A very good way of cultivating this fruit, is to take straight shoots of last year's growth, cut out all the eyes but three or four at the top, and stick them in the ground in rows, say two feet apart. This causes them to grow slowly, yielding larger fruit, and ripening earlier, than when growing in clusters from the root. This month is the best season for cutting and setting out the shoots.

Hemp Culture.—The experience of many of our farmers during the last year, place beyond a doubt, the adaptation of our soil and climate, to the growth of Hemp. We have seen specimens of this article grown in this vicinity, which would compare with the finest Russia. On our prairies the seed should be sown thicker than on more unproductive soils. This would prevent the too large growth of the stalk, and the quantity of lint to the acre would be increased as well as its quality improved. We believe that our prairie soil requires about a bushel and a half to the acre. The principle objection to the raising of hemp is, that it requires too much hard work. This is true to some extent. But let the farmer put in a small quantity, according to his force, say one or two or three acres, and divide his attention between it and other crops, and we are confident that the labor will not prove as hard as he anticipates. At the present prices of produce one acre of hemp of the ordinary yield would be worth as much as twenty five or thirty, of corn or oats. The market of the former would be quick and certain, and the pay cash, while it would be necessary to peddle the latter about the streets, and probably giving one half of it away in order to secure a purchaser for the balance. It is very essential that the crop should be properly rotted, and handled. At the proper season we will publish the most improved modes of conducting these operations. We call the attention of those who expect to engage in the cultivation of this article, and have not procured the seed, to the advertisement of Mr. James Moss in another column. This seed is of the growth of 1842, and will no doubt be sold at a reasonable price.

HAPPINESS—ON THE MERCHANT OF BALSORA. BY LEIGH HUNT.

Abon Ben Adhem (may his tribe increase)
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace,
And saw within the moonlight in his room,
Making it rich and like a lily in bloom,
An angel writing in a book of gold.
Exceeding peace had made Ben Adhem bold,
And to the presence in the room he said,
"What writest thou?" The vision raised its head,
And, with a look made all of sweet accord,
Answered, "The names of those who love the Lord."
"And is mine one?" said Abon. "Nay, not so!"
Replied the angel. Abon spoke more low,
But cheerily still, and said—"I pray thee, then,
Write me as one who loves his fellow men."
The angel wrote, and vanished. The next night
It came again, with a great wakening light,
And showed the names whom love of God had blest,
And lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest!

THE NEIGHBOR.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 3, 1843.

We now, according to promise, present our young friend before the world, in his new dress, and with his new name. As the last week has been one of the warm weeks, in the spring, when vegetation springs forth, and life and animation is given to the vegetable world; so our efforts to cultivate the plant of intelligence, having been watered by industry, enlivened by perseverance, and warmed by the genial rays of patronage, have not been unsuccessful; for the young gentleman has grown in one short week to double his former size. Relative to his dress, we have to apologize a little, as we did not live near a store we could not get all the trimmings which we could have desired, to have made him pass so well with the élite in the fashionable world. However, among plain folks he will now pass very well, and we soon expect to see him in a form that will suit the taste of the most fastidious.

Relative to the course that we shall pursue, we shall endeavor to cultivate a friendly feeling towards all, and not interfere with the rights of others, either politically or religiously. We shall advocate the cause of the innocent and oppressed, uphold the cause of right, sustain the principles of Republicanism, and fly to the succor of the helpless and forlorn, pouring in oil and wine to their wounds, and acting in every way in all the human family, in the capacity that our name imports, viz: that of a neighbor.

We have had, and may have to defend ourselves against the oppressions, persecutions, and innovations of men; and if this should be the case, we shall not shrink from the task; but shall fearlessly, and unflinchingly, defend our rights; sustaining that liberty which our glorious constitution guarantees to every American citizen, for which our fathers jeopardized their liberty, their lives, and their sacred honor.

Amidst the warring elements that are disturbing the world, we are glad to find a amiable and friendly spirit manifested to us at the present time by the press, and we can assure them that so long as they let us alone we shall not interfere with them; it has been our study to avoid contention, and we have never interfered with others until they have thrown down the gauntlet. And as we have not been to the present, so we are determined for the future not to be the aggressors.

We have always endeavored to cultivate a spirit of friendship, amity, and peace with mankind; if we have not succeeded the fault has not been with us. Rumor with her thousand tongues has always been busy circulating falsehood and misrepresentation concerning us, and men have frequently in the absence of correct information, entertained unfavorable opinions concerning us, and have spoken as they thought; but when they have been better informed they have regretted their course and have seen that calumny has been like a viper in our path, and has stung like an adder.

In regard to our political rights, our religion has frequently been made use of by political demagogues as a bugbear to deprive us of the free, untrammelled rights of American citizens; this is a thing that we always have protested against, and we always shall, as long as that blood that fired the bosoms of our ancestors who fought, bled and died, in defence of equal rights, flows through our veins.

Concerning religion we consider that all men have a right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own conscience; and while we allow all men freely to enjoy this privilege untrammelled by us, we look upon all men that would abridge us, or others, in their religious rights, as enemies to the constitution; recalcitrant to the principles of republicanism; and whilst they render themselves despicable, they are striking a secret, but deadly blow at the freedom of this great republic, and their withering influence, though unseen and unobserved, by the many, is like a worm gnawing the very vitals of the free of liberty. We shall always contend for our religious rights. In short the liberty of the press, liberty of conscience and of worship, free discussion, sailors rights, we shall always sustain.

Military.—There will be on the 6th inst. a general review of the Nauvoo Legion, General Arthington Bennett of Arlington House, near New York is expected to attend. The Legion will parade and perform the evolutions on the prairie, we hope the day may be favorable, we expect that the Legion on that day will appear to advantage.

The writer of the following note, Mr. Skinner, is a lawyer, of no mean talent, who has lately come to reside in our city; but who, from some source, unknown to us, has lately been afflicted with insanity. During his mental aberration, he wandered from this place to the neighborhood of Warsaw. Great solicitude was manifested by the citizens of this place on his behalf, and great fears were entertained for his safety. He was finally found in a deplorable situation, near Warsaw, by whom, we have not been informed, nor of the nature of the kindness referred to by Mr. Skinner. We felt sorry to hear of his calamity, and are pleased that he has so far recovered.

Mr. Taylor:—I beg leave through the columns of your paper, to express to the people of Nauvoo, my deep felt gratitude, for the kind and cordial welcome which they have afforded me, during the unfortunate circumstance that has passed with myself. I feel bound so to do, more especially, as I was a stranger, and united with them only by the common ties of humanity. That gratitude will be evinced, whenever occasion shall require any better testimony.

Yours, &c.

PHONOGRAPHY.

Mr. G. D. Watt, from England, delivered two lectures, in this city, on Friday and Saturday evenings last, showing the superiority of phonography, or writing by sound, over every other system of shorthand yet invented. Phonography appears to be a natural method of writing, applicable to all languages, and a perfect system of shorthand. The great utility of shorthand is so obvious, and so universally acknowledged, it is surprising that, in this age of inventions for the saving of time and labor, the science of swift writing has not been more practised, especially considering the large number of works that exist on the subject. The reason of this neglect must be in the insufficiency of these systems.

Stenographers generally have based their systems on our erroneous alphabet and defective method of spelling. Their shorthand consists in copying our writing and spelling, in their own characters generally leaving out the vowels, and such letters as could be dispensed with. Some have attempted, in a measure, to spell as we pronounce; but this could not properly be done with their alphabets, which were deficient in nine different vowel sounds and three consonants. Hence arose the great difficulty in reading their systems after they were written, and which has been the chief obstacle to their general adoption; for most of them are easily learned.

The common method of shorthand spelling, is very far from giving the pronunciation of the word. No wonder, then, that when the vowels are omitted, and some characters represent two letters, there is a difficulty in deciphering such stenographic MSS. We will not, however, further find fault with the common method of spelling, to which most people are necessarily reconciled, nor with the other systems of shorthand, with a few, by dint of practice and perseverance, have managed to acquire. Phonography, as its name imports, is the science of writing by sound, or of writing each word exactly as it is pronounced. For this purpose a new alphabet is given, in which there are signs for all the distinct sounds of the human voice, arranged in their natural order, by this means, the true pronunciation of any word may at once be transferred to paper, without reference to the common roundabout way of spelling. It would appear to give the true sound of any language or dialect. Even the varieties of pronunciation, whether vulgarisms or provincialisms; and it is equally available for writing English or Chinese, Hebrew or Italian.

If phonography possesses half the merit claimed for it by the lecturer, we should hail it with pleasure. Mr. Watt laid the principles of phonography before his audience in a clear and lucid manner, and it therefore remains with them to judge of its merits or demerits and act accordingly. Mr. Watt says:—

This system, which, from its simplicity, is remarkably easy of attainment and pleasing in practice, is so true and perfect a method of writing, that any word in any language, names, or persons and places, the precise pronunciation of a person, &c. can be expressed by it with perfect ease and precision, be read at any distance of time without the possibility of mistake, and with a greater ease than long-hand—it is, therefore, admirably adapted for every species of composition; while, for reporting, it is so remarkably brief, that three simple strokes will invariably write three words taking the average of all the words in the English Language: "indeed, to compare Phonography with Stenography is like comparing the Newtonian system of astronomy with the systems of Tycho Brahe, Ptolemy and others. The one is truth and order, the others are error and disorder." Or to use a more familiar comparison, phonography as compared with mere systems of stenography is, in writing, what railway locomotives are in travelling, as compared with stage coaches.

The weather continues all that can be desired, and our city now presents a lively and beautiful appearance. While it is adorned by the hand of nature in its richest dress, all hands seem engaged in adding to the comforts of the inhabitants. Numbers are employed in improving the streets, and in removing every nuisance, whilst others are engaged in ploughing, digging, fencing, &c. The female part of the inhabitants are busily engaged in their flower gardens, and all around is health, peace, and happiness; and the songs of Zion, are to be heard on every hand, united with those of the feathered tribe in almost every tree.

The Maid of Iowa arrived with a number of passengers from St. Louis, on Tuesday last. She is an excellent conveyance for any one coming up the river, and the passengers speak very highly of the captain and crew. She landed, as usual, at the Nauvoo House, which is very convenient for discharging freight and the accommodation of all those intending to land in this city.

England was visited by a severe snow storm on the 17th and 18th ult. In some low lands and valleys it drifted to the depth of twelve and fourteen feet. On the continent there has also been a heavy fall of snow.

Printers.—A writer in the Mobile Herald, who has been for sixteen years connected with the press, holds the following deserved commendatory language of the members of the craft. None who have had an opportunity of judging will fail to admit the justness of his remarks. He says: "In all our experience, (and we have visited in that time four different governments from the one under which we were born and educated) we have always found among printers not only more intelligence, but more liberality of opinion, more of that noble and high-minded cast of principle that looks with a forgiving eye as well upon the frailties of erring humanity as upon the jars and contentions that grow out of religion or politics, than any other class of men, not excepting the teachers of the religion of the Bible themselves, or the statesmen who thunder in the forum. Printers have a sort of freemasonry with the world. Conversant not only with events that are transpiring in their own neighborhood, but over the whole universe, their occupation, and the peculiar province in which they move, are all calculated to bring within the scope of their vision, and the circle of their interests, the opinions and the feelings of the entire family of man. It is a similar community of interests, and a personal converse with the whole world, that makes the honest tar a whole-souled man, a friend of his species, in whatever port he meets them. But the printer is his superior in one respect: the field of letters, the garden of science, and the very fountain of learning, are in his range, and measurably under his control. With scarcely an exception, there is not one of the profession that a good man might not be proud to take by the hand as an associate and a friend, or that the statesman might not take into his counsel with satisfaction to himself and benefit to the world."

Annexation of Texas.—The Hon. T. W. Gilmore, late governor of Virginia, has recently written a letter in favor of annexing Texas to the United States, and he places the subject in new and striking light. He particularly insists that the present is a favorable season for bringing about such a union, from which he argues that both countries would derive incalculable benefits. The letter is not addressed to party politicians, and will therefore attract attention.

From the Courier de la Martinique, of Feb. 14, 1843.
MORE PARTICULARS OF THE EARTHQUAKE AT GAUDALOPE.

My pen trembles—my thoughts are confounded—I am thunderstruck—I know not where to commence the recital of this overwhelming calamity. Eighth of February—O day forever celebrated in the annals of humanity!—Day forever execrated!—Day that will live in the memory of man as one of those that witnessed the accomplishment of one of the most dreadful decrees of Providence!

It was on the 9th of February, at 35 minutes past 10 o'clock in the morning, that a violent and protracted shock of an earthquake was felt at St. Pierre. I cannot tell you the terror that seized on the inhabitants. When recovered from this fear, the thought immediately turned on the fate of Fort Royal. With what anxiety they were expecting the boat that would bring to us the news of the destruction of our capital. At last, towards three in the afternoon, we were relieved. Fort Royal had been spared. The hand of God had abandoned this spot to all the heavier in other places. The danger over, life had returned its wonted course, except an involuntary terror which reigned everywhere.

The shock had been so long that they feared to see it renewed, and the sad remembrance of the 11th of January established but too much such fears. The next day, about two in the afternoon, a boat that had arrived almost unperceived, brought a letter, one single letter, from Besseterre, which announced that Point a Petre was no more!

I forbear to describe the awful impression of this terrible information. The catastrophe appeared so appalling, that they doubted it. Yet, the letter was there; every body could read the facts. We entertained the most lively fears for the fate of Point a Petre, when a schooner arrived this evening, confirming the total destruction of that city. Nothing official, however, had arrived as yet, and the captain, in consequence of orders received, gave no details; he knew nothing, had heard nothing. The boat had been sent on a speculation! Can you understand that a man in such a moment, in presence of such an event, could employ the facilities of his mind in the combinations of a commercial operation, whose success is based on the total destruction of a city! This is too awful; no word exists that can qualify such baseness.

Let the report be true or false, we did not wait for its confirmation to prepare the succors. By a spontaneous movement a subscription list is opened at the Exchange, and in a moment covered with names, and M. Delleu, mayor of the city, whose conduct deserves the greatest praise, can hardly receive all the donations that crowd on him from all sides. Immediately the place Bertin is crowded by the population; the whole city, old and young, rich and poor, every one brings his mite. A sublime and spontaneous feeling that a unanimous sentiment had brought forth! Generous devotion of a people that forgets its own misfortunes in order only to succor those whose misfortune are, greater still!

Yet it was a most beautiful spectacle to see in this multitude some noble hearts who, in this solemn moment, forgetting their own wretchedness, wished also to contribute to relieve a misery deeper than their own! If we wish to relate here all we have seen of sublime devotion, this article would not suffice. Fied anything more touching than the gift of a poor black fellow who brings his 25 cent piece, and begs they should return him two cents to buy him some flour; and of that poor negro who brings two bundles of sugar canes, for which he has no money to give; and the old woman who offers two shirts to make lint, she says, for the wounded! Are you not moved in seeing such sights? What, compared with this modest offering, is the splendid gift of that man who brings handfuls of gold, which he does not need! Find in the whole world a population that will furnish the example of such generosity.

It was necessary, however, to provide for the most urgent wants of the unfortunate which the scourge had spread. Provisions are bought and given, boats are offered to carry them. The news had been known at three o'clock, and at five a first convoy of four boats was setting sail for Point a Petre, loaded with provisions of all kinds, linen and medicine. A young doctor, distinguished for his learning as his philanthropy, listening only to the voice of his heart, abandons his patients, his family, his friends, and embarks for Point a Petre where he thinks his aid will be as useful as the provisions. Mr. Boulou, who has already received a baptism of fire, and whose arm bears the mark of a noble wound, goes also again to expose himself to the horrors of a city that breathes pestilence. He fears nothing—he starts instantly. A sublime self-abnegation, whose reward is in its own satisfaction.

However, nothing appeased; our eyes continually turned to the Point of the Preacher were anxious to pierce through the expanse of the horizon. Impatience was at its height. This silence pressed nothing good. The sea showed nothing afar off but the vast mirror of its dazzling azure. All was calm; our hearts alone were agitated with a sinister presentiment.

The whole of Friday passed in a frightful doubt. Nothing had been seen. The offerings still poured in. The same eagerness, the same generosity. Zeal redoubled as uneasiness increased. The government had received no official report. All had been active after the letter received at Base Terre. At last, on Saturday morning, the telegraph reported the Monique, the colors at half mast. No more doubt. • • • The disaster must have been tremendous! The whole population rushed to the Place Bertin. They were numbering the strokes of the canoes that were returning from the vessel. The people, on disembarking, were surrounded and almost suffocated in relating the details. The catastrophe was awful. The city of Point a Petre was nothing more than a heap of ruins, and to increase the calamity, the fire, as if jealous to see the work of destruction accomplished without its intervention, was raging among the crumbling houses, the stones that smashed the wounded. The Point is nothing now but a cemetery, whence exhalations issuing from under the rubbish. Every thing is overturned—all are destroyed, annihilated.

There was in Saint Pierre but one cry of desolation. Terror and consternation were depicted on all faces. All those who had an acquaintance, a friend, a relation, in the unhappy city, inquired after him. Such a one? Dead! Such a one? Dead! Such a one wounded, and such a one wounded also. Oh, God! Oh, God! what great crimes had there been committed by this unfortunate city to be so cruelly visited! When Jerusalem sold our Divine Lord and shed his blood, your anger did not fall so heavily upon that devoted city. The voice of your Prophet had announced her last hour, and she could not save herself from her impending fate. Your vengeance, though slow, was tremendous. You had charged men with the execution of your unalterable justice, and the city who had disavowed her God, and had caused the blood of the just man to flow, could redeem herself by her submission; but here, oh God! neither submission nor repentance could save her; her hour was marked on the clock of destiny, and her doom must be accomplished.

Immediately zeal redoubled; persons run from door to door to ask for clothing; the daily labors are abandoned; the cheer of the rich, the hurrahs of the poor, are emptied; and each one tries to give all the linen he has apart. This is not all; in every house you may see the women and the children occupied in preparing lint. The exchange soon presents the same spectacle. Every where activity and labor; ravails. They fear to lose time. They would say that for each moment lost it is a wounded man that utters his last groan.

However, the Monique had not confirmed the news; the principal details were wanted. Her mission called her to Fort Royal. But some vessel arrived to-day from those places of desolation have told us all! We know too much! Our pen trembles to trace the picture of that destruction of a city, in which not a house is standing, not one! • • • and which the fire continues to consume. The few wooden houses which the scourge had spared are a prey to the flames, which have made as many or more victims than the earthquake itself. Unfortunately people, who found themselves buried under the ruins, not being able to extricate themselves from the vastness of rubbish, reached by the fire, saw every chance of rescue vanished. The young girls, old men, women, half buried between blocks of wall, demanded succors which were impossible; in the fire, advancing like a raging sea, rapidly engulfed them. The violence of the elements frightened those whose courage and devotion prompted them to brave all to snatch these unfortunate from their horrible death.

Saturday evening the city was still but a burning furnace!!! Finally, to terminate their sad recitals, here is a letter written upon the ruins of Point a Petre, to Mr. Lathu, a merchant of our city. It says more than we can express, all possible narrations.

"I have received your letter. Thanks for this remembrance. I am well. All ruined or lost; all! all!!! This evening we employ the artillery to finish throwing down the walls in order to save the laborers from their probable crumbling. Since last night we can no longer take the dead bodies away. There are too many. Yours, BERTHELET.

February 11th, 1843.

P. S. Write to my wife."

Three things alone are peering over this vast necropolis. The front of the crumbling church is standing, with the face of its clock still uninjured, the hands of which point out thirty-five minutes past ten, the hour in which was accomplished the ruin of a city, the annihilation of a whole population. The hour of sternity had struck, and in a shorter time than had been necessary perhaps for the hammer to ring and fall, the work of destruction was accomplished. The silence of death had succeeded the tumultuous noise of life. The poor and the rich, the free and the slave, were lying in the same shroud of stone, and the reddish glare of the fire was lighting the funeral pyre of that annihilated people. As a pendant to this sad spectacle, upon a part of a wall of a house half fallen, a picture was preserved, as by a miracle a picture of the ruins of Babylon! A singular coincidence—the traditions of the past, with the reality of the present; the picture of human devastation, in presence of the divine destruction. And farther along, looking on this scene of desolation, the portrait of the king alone, preserved by a strange fatality, seemed to promise protection and succor to those who have had the good fortune to escape the disaster. Yes, sire! you will come to the aid of that population without an asylum—rich yesterday, and to-day ruined, without bread, without clothing. Sire, God has preserved your image here, as he has preserved your days elsewhere, so that you may send succor to a whole people, as you have brought a remedy to the evils of our country; for God, in his terrible justice, has wished to leave to you the noble mission to relieve so great a misfortune, and your picture, preserved in the midst of this frightful catastrophe, was there to warn the unfortunate that they had lost their all—that they still had a father.

Here I stop. It is still under the deep impression of all those dreadful recitals of calmed bodies, drawn from under the ruins, still smoking, three days after the event; of unfortunate people whose voices are begging for succor that no human power could bring to them, that I write these lines. I pressed to give these details, I do not know how my pen has here is no pretensions to the elegance of style; there are still so many things to be said. Must we repeat of the miserable conduct of Mr. Barmon, in the midst of this population without an asylum, and dying with starvation; must we always you some wreck sucking a piece of sugar cane to allay his thirst? Shall I retace the picture of that depopulation of Point a Petre, coming to meet that of St. Pierre, the Mayor covered with a sailor's jacket, and in the middle of all this, the Governor in tears, trying to impart to every body a resignation which he himself probably had not; so much he felt the enormity of the evil, and the impossibility of repairing so great a disaster. I shall say nothing either of Rear Admiral De Moges, whose destiny seems to be to carry help to great misfortunes. A singular casualty! This same man, who, four years ago, was present at the destruction of the capital of the island of which he was the governor, annihilated by an earthquake, is called on to-day to bring help to another city, overthrown likewise by the same scourge! I cannot describe such scenes. These are only the principal facts that I give you here. Time presses. Another may write a longer article. L. B.

PROCLAMATION OF THE GOVERNOR OF MARTINIQUE.
Citizens of Martinique.—The earthquake of the 8th of February has laid Point a Petre in ruins, and such as remain of her unfortunate inhabitants, are without bread and without shelter. We thank Providence that we are permitted to send them help in this awful calamity. On the receipt of the news of this distressing event, the inhabitants of Port Royal and other villages, repaired to the spot with food and clothing. The nights of the 9th and 10th were passed in loading the steam frigate Gomer with provisions and other necessities belonging to the government, and she was immediately dispatched in aid of the distressed. A subscription is now opened for the sufferers, and all receipts will be placed in the hands of M. Liot, Treasurer.
DU VAL DAILLY,
Governor of Martinique.

SECOND EARTHQUAKE IN THE WEST INDIES.

We learn from Capt. Smith, of the schr. Francis Cannady, arrived this morning, that a second shock of an earthquake was experienced at the north part of Guadeloupe, on the 24 inst. At the time, the Captain of a vessel off the north point of the island stated that it shook his vessel with such severity, that it was with difficulty the crew could keep their feet. A dense cloud of smoke ascended from the vicinity of Basseterre, and serious fears were entertained for the safety of that place. It was quite sickly at Point Petre, caused from the offensiveness of the ruins of the town.

The Comet, recently seen at this place, was seen at St. Thomas on the 24th of the present month; it was so brilliant as to cause considerable alarm to the inhabitants. A shock of an earthquake was also felt at St. Thomas on the 25th inst., about half past 9 o'clock at night. No material damage was done.—Charleston Patriot.

PROSPECTUS

WEEKLY NEWSPAPER,

CALLED

THE NAUVOO NEIGHBOR.

We feel pleasure in announcing to our readers and to the public generally, that we have determined to enlarge the Wasp to double its size; as soon as the present volume shall be completed, which will be on the 26th of April.

It made its appearance in the world near twelve months ago; small in stature, dressed in a very humble garb, and under very inauspicious circumstances. It was then thought by many that its days would not be long in the land, and that at any rate it would not survive the sickly season. Many of its elder brethren who thought that they had attained to the size of manhood sneered contemptuously at the idea of their smaller, and younger brother taking the field, and like David's brethren they thought that he was but a stripling, and that he would certainly fall by the hand of some of the great Goliaths; but on the contrary while some of advanced years, noble men, and possessing a more formidable appearance have given up the ghost, the little Wasp has held on the even tenor of his way the untiring, unflinching supporter of integrity, righteousness and truth; neither courting the smiles, nor fearing the frowns of political demagogues, angry partisans, nor fawning sycophants. Partaking so much of the nature of the industrious bee, it has gathered honey from every flower, and its pages are now read with interest by a large, and respectable number of subscribers.

As the young gentleman is now nearly a year old, we propose on his birth day to put him on a new dress, and to make him double the size, that he may begin to look up in the world, and not be ashamed of associating with his older brethren; and as he has acted the part of a good samaritan, we propose giving him a new name.—Therefore his name shall no longer be called THE WASP, but THE NEIGHBOR.

The "Nauvoo Neighbor" will be published on a large imperial sheet, got up in good style, and with care. It will be edited by JOHN TAYLOR, and will be devoted to the dissemination of useful knowledge of every description;—The Arts, Science, Religion, Literature, Agriculture, Manufactures, Trade, Commerce and the general news of the day.

We propose publishing from the best authorities a Bank Note Table corrected weekly; and also a list of the prices current, in the principal Eastern and Western cities, as well as in our own city.

We shall publish a weekly record of deaths in our city, and all ordinances passed by the City Council; the proceedings of Courts Martial, Military Parades, the principal transactions of the Mayor's and the Municipal Court, and every thing of interest that transpires in, and about our city.

Articles on agriculture will be furnished from the best sources, which will make the Neighbor a welcome visitor to our farmers and gardeners.

Concerning Politics we shall not be silent; but reserve to ourselves the right of judging of all measures, parties, and men; and without respect to party, award to all individuals of whom we may have occasion to speak, the true reward of merit or demerit, without prejudice or restraint.

We have sent to Europe to effect an exchange with some of the principal newspapers, in London, Edinburgh, Dublin, and Liverpool, from which we shall be able to furnish to our European friends, as well as American, news that will be interesting. And as we do now exchange with most of the principal papers in the United States, both east, west, north and south, we flatter ourselves, that with the facilities of obtaining information that we possess, and a little care and attention on our part, that the "Nauvoo Neighbor" will be second to none in the west.

The "Neighbor" will be published every Wednesday, by TAYLOR & WOODRUFF, at the corner of Water and Bain streets, Nauvoo, Hancock County, Ill., and its price will be two dollars payable in all cases in advance. Any person procuring five new subscribers and forwarding us ten dollars current money, shall be entitled to one volume gratis.

It must be obvious to all business men, that from the character of the Nauvoo Neighbor, and on account of its extensive circulation, it will afford a first rate medium of advertising. ADVERTISEMENTS conspicuously inserted on reasonable terms,

MILLERISM.

We do not make the following remarks with any intention of persecuting Mr. Miller; but for the sake of exposing error. We consider that Mr. Miller's folly will soon be made manifest to all men, and the merited odium and reproach of propagating a false system will shortly be poured with sufficient violence upon his head, without us interfering with him; but as he professes to be a wise man, and many are excited by his foolish dogmas, there can be no harm in honestly and impartially investigating the principles that he advocates.

The following lecture which he delivers as his, is an old trite notion that has been entertained by many of our ancient divines years ago, soon after, and during the French revolution, and we have often been surprised that men otherwise intelligent, should entertain notions so wild and visionary.

We extract the following from the "Midnight Cry," published in New York, November, 1842.

MR. MILLER'S LECTURE, ON FRIDAY AFTERNOON.

"Mr. Miller's last lecture in this city was on Friday P. M. His text was Rev. xi. 3, 'And I will give power to my two witnesses, and they shall prophesy a thousand and three hundred and three score days, clothed in sackcloth.'"

He took up his subject under four heads: 1. The object and character of a witness. 2. The power. It is to tell the truth on the subject on which he testifies. 'The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.' A witness must testify only to what he knows.

His character for truth and veracity must be good—unimpeachable. It may be a living or a written document, which under some circumstances, as the last will and testament of a person, &c., is of equal or greater weight than a living oral witness.

11. What witnesses are they, spoken of in the text? "My two witnesses," Christ is the speaker, and claims the witnesses for his.

12. What are the witnesses? Some say the church; but the church is a multitude in her individual capacity—one, in her united character. "Shed not away the word of truth on each point relative to Christ. Nor do a succession of apostles, ministers, Bishops, Christ declares, John vi. 24, 'I receive not testimony from man.' The Old and New Testament are two. They are claimed by Christ as his witnesses, Matt. xxiv. 14. 'This gospel of the kingdom must be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations.' In the Old Testament, John, v. 37-39. 'The Father himself hath borne witness of me; I have never heard his voice at any time; I have seen his shape;—the witness is not oral.' Search the scriptures—they are they that testify of me. These two witnesses do testify the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth respecting Christ. They testify a fact that can be known of him until he comes again."

Without making any remarks on the nature and character of a witness, or discerning with Mr. Miller, as to whose witnesses those are, that are thus spoken of; we will proceed to his third head, where he makes the inquiry, 'What are the witnesses?' some say the church, &c. Now although these two witnesses will be Christ's witnesses, and will speak the truth when they do appear, we are very far from believing that they are what Mr. Miller represents them to be, for reasons which will hereafter be mentioned; but that there will be two men who will prophesy in Jerusalem, three years and a half; and that the things spoken of in relation to their prophesying, power, death, life, translation, &c., will be literally fulfilled without such great mystery and profound mystery; and that when it takes place, it will be understood by all connected with it. The Reverend Mr. Irving, of London; who stood at the head of a society that now bears his name—who created such excitement in Britain a few years ago, entertained the same notion that Mr. Miller does for several years, concerning the Old and New Testament being the two witnesses, for some time however before his death, he abandoned those opinions, and believed and propagated extensively throughout Christendom, the opinions which Mr. Miller partially refers to, in regard to the church; but the difficulty which Mr. Miller confronts was obviated by Mr. Irving, for he believed that the spirit and the church, were the two witnesses. That the society which he founded was the true church; that London was the especial place for these witnesses to prophesy in; but that clothed in power, they were to go forth to all nations for three years and a half, to prophesy, to make a speedy work; that at the end of this time the earthquake was to happen; Jesus was to come; the witnesses be taught up, and many other events take place. They had about sixty preachers going through the streets in London, proclaiming these and other things of a similar nature, but Christ did not come at the expiration of that period, and although it is many years since that event was spoken of, some of them have not yet finished their testimony, and the church and spirit have not been caught up unto God and to his throne. We do not mention this as any argument against Mr. Miller's theory, but as perfectly willing it should stand upon its own merits. Mr. Irving's views being wrong, is no reason that Mr. Miller's is; but were we introduced to show that opinions had been formed which would meet those arguments of Mr. Miller's, pertaining to the church being one.

Mr. Miller introduces several quotations to show that it is not man, but the book that will prophesy; John v. 34: 'I receive not testimony from man.' Because Christ says to the unbelieving Jews, 'I receive not testimony from man; I receive to say that God does not make use of man to testify of him; of his purposes, and designs, as these prophets will do! How did we get in possession of the Old and New Testament? The scriptures say that 'holy men of old spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.' The testimony did not come from man; it came from God, through man, the same as it will do when those prophets prophesy. But again, Matt. xxiv. 14: 'This gospel of the kingdom must be preached as a witness unto all nations.' We might here say something in relation to what the gospel is, and what it is not, but have not room. We will state, however, that it is a living principle, and not a dead letter. Our Savior told his disciples to go and preach the gospel, he did not tell them to go and preach the Old and New Testament. Who was to preach the gospel? The apostles. What were they? Our Savior says, 'Ye are my witnesses, as also is the Holy Ghost, which beareth witness of me.' Mr. M. says the witnesses were not oral. What sort of witnesses were the apostles? for they were witnesses.

Mr. M. says that the Old and New Testament

testify all that can be known of him until he comes again. We think that when God restores to Israel their judges as at the first, and their counsellors as at the beginning, that something more will be known of God, and of his purposes. If their judges and counsellors are like Moses, and if these two prophets prophesy, we certainly shall know more of God; and God says to Israel, in speaking of the future, 'I will reveal unto them the abundance of peace and truth.'

14. The history of these witnesses. 1. They prophesy. They foretell all that is known, or ever can be known of Christ. They foretell of his first advent, his suffering and death, together with the time of his death. They foretell his second advent, his glory, and the time of that glory. They prophesy the leading events in the world's history. They prophesy through the whole gospel dispensation; but they prophesy one thousand two hundred and sixty days, or years of that time, 'clothed in sackcloth.'

Sackcloth is the emblem of obscurity. Rev. vi. 12. 'The sun became black as sackcloth of hair,—darkening partial obscurity, but not entire darkness.' These witnesses were darkened by the usurpation of Popery. In 533, in his crusade against the Arian heresy, Justinian, the Greek emperor, conferred supreme power in the church on the Pope of Rome, and constituted him the first of all bishops—head of all the churches—the true and effective corrector of heretics, &c. In 538, Justinian conquered the Ostrogothic Kingdom of Rome, an Arian kingdom, and subjected the whole church to the church of Rome and set up the papal hierarchy. The scriptures were soon suppressed; the Greek and Latin languages ceased to be spoken as living languages, and the people were unable to read them. They prophesied still, but their light did not shine because they were in a language they did not understand. The Catholic church have prohibited the reading of scriptures by the people without the permission of the priests.

We need not to have this thus obscured, we should think that sackcloth meant sackcloth, and not 'partial obscurity.' Job says, 'I have sewed sackcloth upon my skin.' Mr. Miller would have it, 'I have sewed partial obscurity upon my skin'; and in Kings, i. 17 verse, 'and it came to pass, when Ahab heard these words, that he rent his clothes, and put sackcloth upon his flesh, and fasted, and lay in sackcloth, and went softly.' It ought to read according to Mr. Miller's theory, the rent his clothes, and put partial obscurity upon his flesh, and fasted, and lay in partial obscurity, and went softly. Numbers of other instances might be cited to show the folly of such interpretations.

3. 'These have power to shut heaven that it rain not in the days of their prophesy.' Rain is the emblem of Grace, or the outpouring of the spirit. During the dark ages of papal rule, there were but few conversions; until the reformation under Luther and his associates when the Bible began again to be translated into the languages of Europe and was read by the people. Then revivals began. The suppression of the scriptures restrained or hindered the work of God.

Power to shut heaven in the days of their prophesy—we have here as strange a distortion as can possibly be conceived of. How was it that Elijah stopped the heavens? spiritually or literally? We read that it did not rain, that the cattle died, and that the rivers were dried up, and that when he prayed again, the heavens gathered blackness, the rain descended, and the ground was saturated therewith. We suppose that Mr. Miller thinks although God has power to burn the earth instantaneously, that he has not power to give this power to these two prophets as he did to Elijah; or why make such strange contortions to suit his theory? He speaks of the suppression of the scriptures, restraining, or hindering the work of God, whereas these witnesses are not to be suppressed until they are killed; but to have power to shut the heavens, that it rain not in the days of their prophesy: men suppress the scriptures, these are not to be suppressed by men.

4. 'These have power over waters to turn them to blood, and to smite the earth with all plagues as often as they will.' All the plagues which have ever come on the earth or ever will, whether on nations or individuals, are in accordance with the principles laid down in the Bible. They have the power to pronounce these judgments.

What if the plagues are in accordance with the scriptures; do the scriptures pronounce these judgments? Certainly not. Noah pronounced the judgement on the Antediluvians; the angel and Lot, that of Sodom and Gomorrah; our Savior, the destruction of Jerusalem; but Mr. Miller, (not the scriptures) the burning of the world in 1433 or 1844. Did the scriptures ever smite the earth with plagues; or turn the waters to blood? Folly! nonsense! They never did, nor they never will.

5. 'If any man will hurt them, fire proceedeth out of their mouth, and burneth up their enemies.' If any man hurt them he must, in this manner be killed. The word of God pronounces its own sentence on all who injure it, and just what they pronounce will be fulfilled. It testifies unto every man that heareth the words of the prophecy of this book. If any man shall add unto these things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in the book. And if any man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part out of the book of life, and out of the holy city, and from the things which are written in this book.' Rev. xxi. 18, 19.

When did fire ever proceed from the scriptures and kill any body? Fire descended from heaven in Elijah's day and killed many men; but we were only surprised at the ignorance of men for teaching such stuff, and the gullibility of men for receiving it. Relative to the above quotation, we think that if any persons are likely to receive the fire or the plagues, Mr. Miller, and his authors will stand a good chance, for we scarcely know an instance of men making so many additions to that book, as the ones here referred to.

6. 'When they have finished their testimony, (or as Mr. Miller renders it, when they are about to finish their testimony,) the beast which ascendeth out of the bottomless pit, shall make war on them, and kill them.' 'A beast,' in the symbolic language of Revelation, signifies a government. 'The beast from the bottomless pit,' is a government that has no foundation to build upon, but rises up without religion and illegitimacy. Such was the Revolutionary government of France, at the close of the last century. It was founded in Atheism and the rejection of religion in every form. That government made war on the Bible, and swore to exterminate it—declared it to be a lie, Jesus Christ an impostor, death an eternal sleep, and, finally, that there is no God.—They closed the churches of France, and executed the clergy. They abolished the Sabbath, and every other institution founded on the Bible. The worship of God in all forms and kinds was discarded and prohibited. It was thus that this government made war on the witnesses and killed them. They gathered Bibles in heaps, and burned them. They tied a copy of the Bible to the tail of an ass, and dragged it through the streets of Lyons, while the populace followed with shouts and acclamations. The abolition of religion took place September 1793; and in 1797, in the month of March (after just three and a half years) the law was passed revoking the decrees against religion, and granting toleration to all Christians.

7. 'This, during the three days and a half, their dead bodies were not permitted to be put in their graves, although they lay dead in the streets of the great Roman city, which is spiritually, or by the Spirit, is called Sodom and Egypt, from its great uncleanness, and oppression of the people of God—the crying sins of Sodom;—where, also, our Lord was crucified.' In the person of his members and disciples.—From thirty thousand to fifty thousand Hougoulets were slain in France in one night, on St. Bartholomew's eve, 1572.

8. 'The nations shall see their dead bodies three days and a half, and shall not suffer their dead bodies to be put in graves.' 'Although condemned and denounced in France, yet in other nations the Bible still lived in the sight of the people. The beast of the infidels to exterminate the Bible, was brought to nought.

9. 'After three days and a half, the spirit of life from God entered into them, and they stood upon their feet, and great fear fell upon them which saw them.'

'The resurrection of the witnesses and their exaltation to heaven, is the revocation of the laws against religious worship and the Bible, 1797, three and a half years from the prohibition in 1793. Great fear fell on the infidel world when they saw the triumph of the Bible, and its spread over the earth. The great voice from heaven saying to them, 'Come up hither,' is the universal demand of the moral world for the Bible. So that since 1793, it has been translated either in whole or in part, into more than 50 different languages, and spread in nearly all nations.'

Unfortunately for Mr. Miller's theory, the dead bodies of these prophets were to lay in the streets of Jerusalem; and not in the streets of Lyons, in France; in the streets of that city which spiritually (when the Lord means us to spiritualize he tells us of it) was called Sodom and Egypt, where also our Lord was crucified. The place is here already designated. Where was our Lord crucified? The answer is in Jerusalem. We might again ask, where will these prophets prophesy, be killed, and raised? The answer is in Jerusalem, and not in Lyons, nor in any other place, for it was where our Lord was crucified, that they were to prophesy. But to say that the scriptures were destroyed at that time is too far fetched even for a spiritualizer; it is preposterous. Were the bibles destroyed in Italy, England, Scotland, Ireland, Germany, Poland, Switzerland, Russia, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, America, Prussia, Austria, Spain, Portugal, Turkey; if not how do we make it out that the bible was destroyed, that the witnesses even according to Mr. Miller's theory, were killed?

Again, did those nations rejoice over this ungodly step of the French in Lyons, and not suffer their dead bodies to be put in their graves. We will here quote the scripture a little more full than Mr. Miller has done, for we presume that with all his ingenuity he could not make this part fit with even his wildest and most flighty calculations. And their bodies shall lie in the street of the great city, which is spiritually called Sodom and Egypt, where also our Lord was crucified. And they of the people and kindred and tongues and nations shall see their dead bodies three days and a half, and shall not suffer their dead bodies to be put in their graves. And they that dwell upon the earth shall rejoice over them, and make merry, and shall send gifts one to another; because these two prophets tormented them that dwell on the earth. And after three days and a half the spirit of life from God entered into them, and they stood upon their feet; and great fear fell upon them which saw them. Rev. xi. 9, 10, 11.

We again ask from this description, was it in France or in Jerusalem that these prophets were killed? and again state if we can find out where our Lord was crucified, we shall know the place.

Did the people, and kindred, and tongues, and nations see their dead bodies laying in the streets of Lyons, and not suffer them to be buried?—or did the French burn the old and new testament and the other nations have nothing to do directly or indirectly in the affair? Did they that dwell on the earth rejoice and make merry, and send gifts one to another, when the bibles were burned, and christianity trampled under foot in France? or were the nations tormented with the old and new testaments. And again, did the spirit of life from God enter into the bibles that were burned in Lyons, or did their ashes remain there? Did the bibles stand upon their feet. (Query, where were their feet?) Did they ascend up to heaven in a cloud? Did they have not got the old and new testament, for we live on the earth. Again we ask did any of the above things take place in Lyons or in France? No says every man of common sense. No! echoes the word of God and history. No! echoes the word of God above named. No! says France, these things did not take place in me.

9. 'The same hour there was a great earthquake, and a tenth part of the city fell.' Earthquake, when used symbolically, signifies a revolution of a kingdom. The hour signifies period, the same period. The city the Roman Empire.

Thus Rev. 17: 18. 'That great city which reigneth over the kings of the earth, or the Roman Empire.' 'Tenth part of the city fell,' ceased its allegiance to the Roman power, and threw off the yoke of popery, and finally took away the papal dominion in Rome itself.

10. 'Were slain of men, or as in margin, names of men, seven thousand.' To slay the names of men is to abolish their titles and dignities. This was done in the French Revolution, when all names, titles and dignities of the clergy and nobility were abolished, and only the simple title of citizen was allowed to any man. The number seven, signifying the perfect nullity of all titles.

A tenth part of the city fell. Of what city? Mr. Miller has now taken us from France, and planted us in Rome; before he had it that Lyons, in France, was the place where the prophets (the old and new testaments) were killed, buried, and resurrected. Now we are told that Rome is the city; (for mark it was the city that the two witnesses prophesied in, that a tenth part of it fell,) and not content with Rome, he drags in the whole of the Roman Empire. Thus according to this, in the Roman Empire the prophets prophesied, were killed, and resurrected. Before we had it that it was infidel that destroyed good things; now it must be laid at the doors of Catholicism.

We have now waded through this great sermon of the great Mr. Miller, and turn away from it with disgust, for such a bundle of balderdash, folly and nonsense, we never before witnessed. Some of Mr. Miller's followers have said that the Mormons were the best spoken of by John; if, indeed, they are, they have not got so many eyes, ears, horns and hoofs, as he has manifested; and if we are to judge of beings by their intelligence, we must think, from the above, that his intellectual powers range far below that of the human species. Besides his standing in society compares so well with the description given by John in Rev. "and all the world wondered after the beast." Mr. Miller has published the following:

Why is it, if our arguments and promises are as vulnerable and fragile as they would seem to affect, that they do not, by the bible, and fair arguments, meet and refute us?

If it had not been for that, and their interference with us, perhaps we might have left them to their folly; for we are not afraid that these notions could in the least obtain among the Latter Day Saints.

My Epitaph.

BY MISS ELIZA A. GROW.

'Tis not the tribute of a sigh

From sorrow's bleeding bosom drawn;

Nor tears that flow from pity's eye,

To weep for me when I am gone;

No costly balm, no rich perfume,

No vain epithet that I claim;

No mournful knell, no marble tomb,

Nor sculptured stone to tell my name.

It is holier still to leave

Than time-proof, monumental piles,

That rise planted on my grave,

Or willers drip'd in dewy tears.

The garlands of hypocrisy

May be equip'd with many a gem;

I prize the heart's sincerity

Before a princely diadem.

In friendship's memory let me live,

I know no earthly wish beside;

I ask no more; yet, oh, forgive

This impulse of too just a pride.

The silent pulse of memory,

That beats to the utter'd tone

Of tenderness, is more to me

Than the fragility of a stone.

For friendship holds a secret cord,

That with the fibres of my heart,

Entwines so deep, so strong, so hard

For death's dissecting hand to part!

I feel the low responsive roll,

Like the far echo of the night,

And whisper softly through my soul,

"I would not be forgotten quite."

To the Editor of the Weekly Bee:

SIR—The progress of Mormonism or the doctrine of the Latter Day Saints in Boston; the closing of Elder Adams' official labors in the east; preparations making for his immediate departure for the west; the great Mormon temple at Boylston Hall, that came off in high glee; and your liberality in giving to the readers of your 'busy Bee' the latest news on every subject;—has induced me to give you a short sketch of the closing up of the labors of this great apostle of Mormonism in Boston. On Thursday evening, March 23d, agreeable to appointment, he addressed an immensely large concourse of people, on the character and mission of Joseph Smith, the prophet. In speaking of him, he bears a positive and direct testimony to the divinity of his mission. He does this without hesitation; just as if he meant what he said, and said what he meant. He does not say he hopes Joseph Smith is a true prophet, but says he is positive that such is the fact.—On Sabbath, March 24th, during the day, he introduced Elder E. L. Magins, and gave him a high recommendation as an able minister of the fulness of the gospel, who is to take his place in Boston for the present. He also spoke of Elder Orson Hyde, one of the twelve apostles, that would probably visit this spring;—and according to Adams' account of him, he must be a perfect Apollo in learning and eloquence. As usual, the Boylston Hall was a perfect jam during the day and evening. On Tuesday evening, he gave his farewell lecture. That was a rich treat indeed, embodying the outline of the faith and doctrine of Latter Day Saints.—But on Wednesday evening, at the great tea party, was the time it was clearly manifested that kindest feelings existed in this city towards the Mormons. There was present on that occasion over 600 people: 350 sat down at the first table. After supper, Elder Adams delivered a very appropriate and eloquent address it was listened to with profound attention, during which time we saw the tear start in many an eye—plainly indicating that they deeply regretted that Elder Adams was about to leave them. During his remarks, he spoke very beautifully of the marriage supper of the Lamb; that was to wind up this last dispensation—cause creation to cease to groan—and usher in the long looked for period, when universal religion, liberty and toleration shall be proclaimed from mountain top to mountain top, and every man in every place, shall meet a brother and a friend. It seems strange to many that Elder Adams should be called away at this time, as his very name is a tower of strength to the Mormon cause in the east. Thousands are looking for the day when he shall return; petitions are getting up here and elsewhere for his return. This is as it should be, and we sincerely hope that the authorities of the Church at the west, will see it their duty to send him to us again as soon as possible. He left with the prayers, and blessings of the saints and friends; and I have no hesitation in saying that thousands will hail with joy the day of his return.

Yours truly, (not a Mormon, but) one of the many friends to that much abused people.

Boston, April 1, 1842.

Eight miles below this place, on the other side of the river, is Nauvoo, the city of the Prophet. It is beautifully situated, on a point formed by a broad and sweeping bend of the river. The ground rises in successive benches of several feet in height, each bench extending back some distance, forming a level place of table land to the next bench. On the last and highest bench, which is level with the surrounding country, stands the Temple, which is to be a magnificent building. The basement only is raised. The town at least miles long and two or three wide, being a circular strip following the curve of the river. Nothing can be more beautiful than the situation of the city of saints. It contains at least 10,000 inhabitants, and as many a crowd as you can imagine.

There is but little of the prophet or saint in Joseph's exterior. He is a large, powerfully built man, and I believe is reckoned to be a social, good natured, good hearted, clever fellow, with a nervous iron, an eye of fire, a heart of stone, and a head full of all sorts of things. Let him alone and he is your friend, but it is dangerous to trifle with him. Much has been said about the Mormons, but after all they are like other men, and their prophet is a man like unto us all. There is nothing in their belief that is incredible, except it be the inspiration of their prophet, and that I must be permitted to doubt.

The greatest difference between them and the Methodists is, that they have more of the spirit than the followers of Wesley. When a Methodist would shout, a Mormon would prophesy, when the former would cry "glory," the latter would speak in unknown tongues. When one would pray over a sick brother, the other would lay on his hands and heal him—if he could. [When the Methodist faith falls him respecting some parts of the Bible, and he has recourse to the spiritualizing system to get along, the Mormon swallows all down, just as it stands, like the whale swallowed Jonah, hat and shoes; the former worships a God without body, parts or passions, while the latter worships the same being that Moses speaks of seeing his back parts, beholding his face, and being angry with the wicked every day. The Mormon is always prepared to give you some reason for every thing connected with his religion, whilst the other worships he knows not what.] You have doubtless heard of the thrivish propensities of the Mormons. They are not such great eaters as they are represented. Much stealing is done on their credit of which they are not guilty. They have been charged in this world with much of which there will be no record against them in the next. My sheet is drawing to a close, and I must pull in my horns. I could discourse of many matters to you had I room. You have heard of the late treaty, by which a new purchase has been made of the Indians;—that is all the rage here now, and all the world is bound for the "New Purchase." Thousands, I verily believe, are ready to start for that untrodden region, as soon as the gates are opened which will be on the 12th of May next. The river has been frozen over solid for more than three months, so that teams have crossed on it constantly. We have had good sleighing most of that time. We have cold dry winters here, but no changes from wet to dry.

LOOK HERE.

I would say to emigrants, and all the brethren, that I have a few lots on hand, that I will sell very cheap, as I am going on my mission soon, and wish to sell before I go.

Also, I have lots with buildings on them. If any one wishes for a good store building near the Temple, I can accommodate them. BRIGHAM YOUNG.

WAR WITH THE ENGLISH AND JAPANESE.

No sooner have the English secured to themselves a firm footing in the Celestial Empire, than they discover that the rich country of Japan would be an admirable ground to attempt a footing also; recent failures of British Merchants to negotiate for a commercial intercourse, and the destruction of an English brig, 3 years ago, at Japan, have determined the English to insist on a commercial treaty, after the most approved pacific manner, so successfully practiced in China. We should not be the least surprised to see, within the present year, the East India fleet demand reparation for losses and insults, (real or imaginary,) and if they be resisted (as of course they will be), commence an attack and force open the Japanese ports, that have been closed two hundred years.

After India and China, Japan may rank the third country in importance for European intercourse. At present the Japanese are independent of every foreign power. Their religion is the worship of idols—they have gold in the greatest abundance, its sources being inexhaustible; the entire roof of the palaces,—according to what we are told by those who have access to the place,—are covered with a plating of gold, in the same manner as we cover houses, or more properly, churches, with lead. The islands abound in pearls of large sizes of a pink or red color, exceeding in value that of the white.

Kaempfer compares the appearance of the Japanese Islands to the British Islands,—the former lying off the eastern coast of Asia; in each group there is one large or chief island, containing the principal constituting the main body of the empire.

The population is about twenty-five millions—the number of islands composing the empire of Japan is unknown; the three principal ones are Kioson—Sitkof, and Nippon, the largest. These cover many degrees of latitude from north and south as do the British Islands, and contain about one hundred and sixty thousand square miles. So early as 1630, the Dutch had a factory established. In 1638, dissensions having occurred with the Dutch and the Japanese, all foreigners from that period have been denied commercial access. The Portuguese, Dutch, English and Russians have in vain attempted to corralize the authorities to admit their vessels. The Emperor maintains a determined and rigorous non-intercourse system—the commerce of the Japanese, is entirely internal; but within perhaps a year the British may add "Japan" to their colors. Nous verrons!

TALENTS MISAPPLIED.

In many of the seats of justice in the upper countries, it is truly melancholy to observe the number of hard-headed and strong-limbed young men lounging about year after year, ostensibly practising one of the learned professions, but whose actual professional income would not amount to the hire of a good negro, while a great many of them do not earn so much as would keep a dog.

If the individuals composing this class were independent in their circumstances or their friends were willing to support them in idleness, or were they in delicate health or unable to labor for a subsistence yet with talents to justify their pretensions to law and medicine, no one could censure their course; but when we look around us the teeming prairies and rich woodlands, uncultivated and uncultivated, inviting the youthful and healthy to the noble independence with wholesome exertion and moderate industry, we are impelled to the conclusion that a stronger term than "misapplied talents" should be applied to them, that they continue in their course from a disreputable and disgraceful aversion to work, and an over-weening disposition to suppose a half-starved and shabbily clothed hanger-on, on the outskirts of a profession, more respectable than an industrious, though hard-fisted farmer or mechanic.

The professions are ably and quite sufficiently represented in the western, and in fact this whole country, by men whose practice and experience have proved them competent to transact all the business, and it would probably be well for those unfledged birds whom a trial of sufficient time has proved to be unfitted for a successful flight in the professions, to abandon a course for which nature never intended them, and, before it is too late, learn some useful and laborious occupation by which they may be enabled to earn an honest living, and become useful in a community where they now mistakenly consider themselves ornamental.—Quincy Whig.

Miscellaneous.

Water running up Hill.—Dr. Smith, in a recent lecture on Geology, at New York, mentioned a curious circumstance connected with the Mississippi river. It runs from north to south, and its mouth is actually four miles higher than its source, a result due to the centrifugal motion of the earth. Thirteen miles is the difference between the equatorial and polar radii; and the river in 2,000 miles has to rise one-third of this distance, it being the height of the equator above the pole. If this centrifugal force were not counteracted, the rivers would flow back, and the ocean would overflow the land.

Some of our philosophers found out awhile ago that the moon was made of green cheese; 'spose it's true, it has not been contradicted.

An Irish mile is 2240 yards; a Scotch mile 1084 yards; and English or statute mile, 1760 yards; German 1806; Turkish 1826.

An acre is 4840 square yards, or 63 acres, 1 foot, 8 1/2 inches each way.—A square mile, 1760 yards each way, contains 640 acres.

Whole family Poisoned.—We have not read of a more dreadful calamity than that detailed by a recent number of the Grenada (Miss.) Register. This paper informs us of the whole family of Mr. Morehead, residing near the Yauco Pass, having been poisoned by eating poached dried on a painted board. One of his daughters was to have been married on the very day she was so suddenly taken from earth. The marriage clothes were sent home as the funeral bier was preparing, and a cloud of woe bedimmed the now blasted hopes of the partner of her bosom. The eldest son, prostrated on a bed of death had just returned from a five years' study in the learned cloisters of old Harvard, crowned with his laurel wreaths of honor and glory. Death spread his banner o'er the whole. Father, mother, son and daughter, now sleep the sleep of death, stretched side by side, and wrapped in the embers of the cold earth.

Shocking Accident.—A young man in Stoneham, while sliding from a hay mow, recently came in contact with a hay-fork, which entered his abdomen. Medical aid was instantly called, but after lingering thirty hours, the unfortunate man expired. His name was Conzague Dulles, from Canada, aged 22 years.

A tender hearted Lady.—A lady who made pretensions to the most refined feelings, went to her butcher to remonstrate with him on his cruel practices. "How," said she, "can you be so barbarous as to put little innocent lambs to death?" "Why not, Madam," said the butcher, "you would not eat them alive, would you?"

Self Paying Tobacco box.—The Albany Journal describes a neat little machine with the forgoing name stamped upon it, and which is intended for use in hotels and other public houses where tobacco is in demand. On depositing a penny in the box and pressing a spring, a little drawer shoots out containing a small paper of tobacco. But the drawer will not move, nor the call for tobacco be answered, however hard the spring may be pressed, until the penny is dropped into the sub-treasury of the machine.

Watches to be Cheapened.—The London correspondent of the Journal of Commerce gives the following account of an invention for making watches by machinery:

"Some discoveries for the more speedy manufacture of watches have been for some time past occupying the attention of scientific and wealthy men, and have at last been taken up by the great West End firm of Howell & James, Regent street. Some gentleman has been devoting twenty years of his life to the inventions whereby he is now enabled, by a variety of machines, to construct an incredible number of watches of every variety of size in a day! By one machine 36,000 perfect plates can be produced in one day; and by five machines, also centre, barrel, and fourth wheels, crossed, polished, and cut, with balances for 300, movements, by another 300 pinions are cut and rounded, by another drills the holes, the tapping, screw-holes, &c., planting the depths and escapements. Four other machines will make pivots for 50 movements a day. Twenty other machines for every description of work connected with watch-making, make up the set. The best chronometer makers in London, after having inspected the whole of the machines, and seen them work, and carefully examined the products, have declared that every part produced by them is far superior to any thing that has been or can be produced by other means at the present day.

The Comet of 1843.—Mr. Editor: This day, Feb. 29, a comet of great brilliancy has been seen, visible through the day without the aid of a glass, and its brilliancy almost equal to that of Venus. Its situation is very near the eastern limb of the sun; its tail appears about 3 deg. in length. It may be the comet announced some three months since in Europe; it is then traversing the constellation Draconis; or be it that or another it is of rare brilliancy. There are but three on record of sufficient brilliancy to be seen in the day season. The first was 43 years before Christ, and is called a "hairy star"; it was seen with the naked eye in the day time. The second was in the year 1402, and it was so brilliant that the light of the sun, at the end of March, did not hinder people seeing it at mid-day; both its nucleus and its tail were, to use the language of the day, "two fathoms long." The third appeared in Feb. 18, 1744, and nearly equaled Venus in splendor, and many persons saw it at mid-day without glasses. It may yet prove that the comet of today is the same as that of 1402. Three observations only are necessary to calculate its orbit, the elements of which, if previously registered, will enable astronomers to decide whether the comet under consideration has appeared or not.

Of 504 comets that have entered the solar system, 24 have passed between Mercury and the Sun, 47 within Venus, 59 between Venus and the Earth, 73 between the Earth and Mars, and 302 between Mars and the orbit of Jupiter, and no casualty has occurred to primary or satellite. The comet of 1770 passed thro' the system of Jupiter without producing the slightest effect; still many people are alarmed at the appearance of these erratic bodies, these rail cars of the stellar regions, the mystery of whose office and destiny makes their astronomy of intense interest.

With reference to the danger of a comet's striking the earth, we here add that the comet Encke, whose period is only 1,307 days, and nearest the earth of all the comets known, cannot come in collision short of a period of 219,000,000, of years, which calculation is based upon astronomical facts.—New Bedford Mercury.

Invention.—A young mechanic of Frederick, Md., says the Philadelphia Ledger, has invented an apparatus to be used in firing cannon. It is expected to save about one-third of the force of the powder, by closing the vent at the moment the piece is discharged; saves the labor of the vent-holder after the discharge, and prevents the smoke from issuing from the vent-hole, which creates so much confusion in rapid discharges, especially on shipboard between decks.

An Intelligent dog.—The Troy Whig relates the following anecdote of a Newfoundland: On a certain Sunday, after church, the family were all assembled in the drawing-room, and every member of it, with one exception, occupied in reading. The dog, after making a reconnaissance of the party, proceeded of his own accord to the library, and taking down a book from the shelves, returned and presented it to the individual who was unprovided with that convenient instrument for whiling away the long quarter of an hour before dinner.

Judge Waggoner. who fought a duel with Dennis Prier in New Orleans, it is said will have to submit to amputation of one of his legs, owing to a wound received from the ball of his antagonist.

Daguerrotype.—Mr. Van Loan, who went to Europe for the purpose of perfecting the art of taking Daguerrotype pictures, has been quite successful. We have seen some of his pictures which are quite another thing from any thing in the art which we have ever seen before. They are taken almost instantaneously, are much more distinctly delineated than before, and withal, red, green and all other colors are copied as faithfully as mere black and white.

Border Difficulties.—The Bangor (Me.) Daily Whig contains the proceeding of a public meeting of the citizens of Hancock Plantation, in relation to the arrest of Daniel Savage, a citizen of Aroostock county, who was attempted to be carried out, on civil suit, by individuals known to be authorized agents of the authorities of the Province of New Brunswick, on the 11th instant. It appears that great excitement prevailed upon the border, and that the people aided by the U. S. troops succeeded in effecting his rescue. Subsequently the citizens met, and passed sundry resolutions expressing indignation at the outrage, and it was voted, that the thanks of the meeting be presented to Capt. Webster, commanding the U. S. troops for Fort Kent, for so promptly furnishing assistance to the civil authorities to recapture our citizen on our own soil as defined by the late treaty, and to secure and bring the offender to justice.

Mexico.—An insurrection broke out and was suppressed at Tampico on the 20th ult. Twenty of the ringleaders were arrested, among whom is a priest.

Accident.—We are informed a most fatal accident occurred last week, in the southern part of this country. Several of the best men collected together for the purpose of raising a house. They had got the building up several rounds, when, by some mistake in rolling a log to its place, it slipped and fell with its full force to the ground. In its fall the timber came in contact with the person of Doctor John B. Radford, and wounded him mortally. He survived a few hours, during which time he gave directions concerning his family and property. Dr. R. has but lately become a citizen of this country; but, for the short time he has been among us, no man ever enjoyed a larger share of his neighbor's confidence. This community, as well as his friends, materially feel his loss.—[Lex. Express, April 4.]

Wonderful Mine.—The Winchester Virginian contains an account of the discovery of a mine about eighteen miles south west of that place, the ore of which is alleged to contain gold, silver, copper, and perhaps other minerals. This mine, it is said, is as great in extent as it is rich in precious metals, being about 20 miles in length by six or eight in breadth.

MILITARY.

On Saturday last we had a general parade of the "Nauvoo Legion," according to previous appointment. There were not so many spectators present as there would have been if the weather had been more favorable. It was very cold and windy throughout the day. The Legion however looked well, better than on any former occasion; and they performed their evolutions in admirable style.

General Arlington Bennet was prevented from being present, as was anticipated, in consequence of sickness.

The officers did honor to the Legion, many of whom were equipped, and armed, cap-a-pie. Many ladies on horseback honored us with their presence, and we observed that the men were in good spirits; that they had made great improvements, both in uniform and discipline, and from what we saw, we felt proud to be associated with a body of men which in point of discipline, uniform, appearance, and a knowledge of military tactics, are the pride of Illinois, one of its strongest defences, and a great bulwark of the western country.

Two officers of the regular army were present, and expressed great satisfaction at our appearance and evolutions. Lieutenant General Joseph Smith, delivered a spirited and patriotic address on the occasion, which was received with enthusiasm by both officers and men. He was followed by General Swazy of Iowa, in his usual good style.

The Maid of Iowa left Nauvoo on Tuesday Morning last with about one hundred Gentlemen and Ladies on a pleasure excursion to Burlington, they had on board a fine band of Music. Through the politeness of Captain Jones we were favored with an invitation to join the party, and never enjoyed ourselves better. General Joseph Smith and lady, his mother and family, were of the party. We had an excellent address from our esteemed friend P. P. Pratt; the band performed its part well; much good humor and hilarity prevailed. The Captain and officers on board did all they could to make us comfortable, and on the whole, we had a very agreeable and pleasant trip. We started with the intention of visiting Augusta; but were informed that in consequence of the lowness of the river, it would be impracticable, we therefore altered our course to Burlington, touching at Fort Madison on our way up, and at Shokagon on our return.

The Maid of Iowa did well; her accommodations are good for the size of the boat, and she performed her trip in less time than we could have anticipated. We think that she is admirably adapted for running between this place and St. Louis, especially in low water, and as she tries to accommodate us, we ought to try to accommodate her. We have been a good deal abused and imposed upon by some of the other boats, and when we have one that is friendly to our interests, we ought to sustain her.

We make these remarks because we have been informed, that an influence has been exercised against her, in St. Louis, and other places, in consequence of her being employed in the Mormon trade. If this is the case, we shall do well to look to our interests, and if other people wish to deal on the exclusive system, in small things, we may in some larger things; if they feel disposed to pass by our boats and use an influence against them, we may feel disposed to pass by their goods, and find another market, and send our boats where they will be better treated. We think that others are as much indebted to us, as we are to them. If they think not, still persist in this ungentlemanly course, we would advise our merchants to adopt the non-intercourse plan, and send their money to another market. We have been insulted long enough—it is time now that a stop should be put to it, and if men's prejudices will lead them to act like fools, perhaps their interests will bring them to their reason.

It will be seen by reference to another column that McKenzie is acquitted. The New York Herald thinks however, that this is not the last of the case.

ANCIENT RECORDS.

Circumstances are daily transpiring which give additional testimony to the authenticity of the Book of Mormon. A few years ago, although supported by indubitable, unimpeachable testimony, it was looked upon in the same light by the world in general, and by the religious world in particular, as the expedition of Columbus to this continent was by the different courts that he visited, and laid his project before. The literati looked upon his expedition as wild and visionary, they suspected very much the integrity of his pretensions, and looked upon him—to say the least—as a fool, for entertaining such wild and visionary views. The Royal courts, aided by geographers, thought it was impossible that another continent should, or could exist; and they were assisted in their views by the learned clergy, who, to put the matter beyond all doubt, stated that it was contrary to Scripture; that the apostles preached to all the world, and that as they did not come to America, it was impossible that there should be any such place. Thus at variance with the opinions of the great, in opposition to science and religion, he set sail, and actually came to America; it was no dream, no fiction; but a solid reality; and however unphilosophical, and indeed the notion might be, men had to believe it; and it was soon found out, that it would agree both with religion and philosophy.

So when the Book of Mormon first made its appearance among men, it was looked upon by many as a wild speculation, and that it was dangerous to the interest and happiness of the religious world; but when it was found to teach virtue, honesty, integrity, and pure religion, this objection was laid aside, as being unreasonable. We were then told that the inhabitants of this continent were, and always had been, a rude barbarous race, uncouth, unlettered, and without civilization. But when they were told of the various relics that have been found indicative of civilization, intelligence and learning; when they were told of the wealth, architecture and splendor of ancient Mexico; when recent developments proved beyond a doubt, that there was ancient ruins in Central America, which, in point of magnificence, beauty, strength and architectural design, would vie with any of the most splendid ruins on the Asiatic continent; when they could trace the fine delineations of the sculptor's chisel, on the beautiful statue, the mysterious hieroglyphic, and the unknown character, they began to believe that a wise, powerful, intelligent and scientific race had inhabited this continent; but still it was improbable, nay, almost impossible—nowwithstanding the testimony of history to the contrary, that anything like plates could have been used anciently; particularly among this people. The following letter and certificate, will perhaps have a tendency to convince the sceptical; that such things have been used, and that even the obnoxious Book of Mormon, may be true; and as the people in Columbus' day were obliged to believe that there was such a place as America; so will the people in this day be obliged to believe, however reluctantly, that there may have been such plates as those from which the Book of Mormon was translated.

Mr. Smith has had these plates, what his opinion concerning them is, we have not yet ascertained. The gentleman that owns them has taken them away, or we should have given a fac simile of the plates and characters in this number. We are informed however, that he purposes returning with them for translation; if so, we may be able yet to furnish our readers with it.

It will be seen by the annexed statement of the Quincy Whig, that there are more dreamers and money diggers, than Joseph Smith, in the world, and the worthy editor is obliged to acknowledge that this circumstance will go a good way to prove the authenticity of the Book of Mormon. He further states that, "if Joseph Smith can decipher the hieroglyphics on the plates, he will do more towards throwing light on the early history of this continent than any man living." We think that he has done that already, in translating and publishing the Book of Mormon, and would advise the gentleman and all interested, to read for themselves, and understand. We have no doubt however, but Mr. Smith will be able to translate them.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEIGHBOR.

On the 10th of April last a respectable merchant by the name of Robert Wiley, commenced digging in a large mound near this place; he excavated to the depth of 10 feet, and came to rock; about that time the rain began to fall, and he abandoned the work. On the 23d he and quite a number of the citizens with myself, repaired to the mound, and after making ample opening, we found plenty of rock, the most of which appeared as though it had been strongly burned; and after removing full two feet of said rock, we found plenty of charcoal and ashes; also human bones that appeared as though they had been burned; and near the cephalon a bundle was found that consisted of six plates of brass, of a bell shape, each having a hole near the small end, and a ring through them all, and clasped with two clasps, the ring and clasps appeared to be of iron very much oxidized. The plates appeared first to be copper, and had the appearance of being covered with characters. It was agreed by the company that I should cleanse the plates; accordingly I took them to my house, washed them with soap and water, and a woolen cloth; but finding them not yet cleansed I treated them with dilute sulphuric acid which made them perfectly clean, on which it appeared that they were completely covered with hieroglyphics that none as yet have been able to read. Wishing that the world might know the hidden things as fast as they come to light, I was induced to state the facts, hoping that you would give it an insertion in your excellent paper for we all feel anxious to know the true meaning of the plates, and publishing the facts might lead to the true translation. They were found, I judged, more than twelve feet below the surface of the top of the mound.

I am most respectfully a citizen of Kinderhook.

W. F. HARRIS, M. D.

The following certificate was forwarded for publication, at the same time.

We the citizens of Kinderhook, whose names are annexed do certify and declare that on the 23d April 1843, while excavating a large mound, in this vicinity, Mr. R. Wiley took from said mound, six brass plates of a bell shape, covered with ancient characters. Said plates were very much oxidized—the lands and rings on said plates mouldered into dust on a slight pressure. The above described plates we have handed to Mr. Sharp for the purpose of taking them to Nauvoo.

SINGULAR DISCOVERY—MATERIAL FOR ANOTHER MORMON BOOK.

A Mr. J. ROBERTS, from Pike county, called upon us last Monday, with a written description of a discovery which was recently made near Kinderhook, in that county. We have not room for his communication at length, and will give so much of a summary of it, as will enable the reader to form a pretty correct opinion of the discovery made.

It appeared that a young man by the name of Wiley, a resident in Kinderhook, dreamed three nights in succession, that in a certain mound in the vicinity, there was treasures concealed. Impressed with the strange occurrence of dreaming the same dream three nights in succession, he came to the conclusion, to satisfy his mind by digging into the mound. For fear of being laughed at, if he made others acquainted with his design, he went by himself, and labored diligently one day in pursuit of the supposed treasure, by sinking a hole in the centre of the mound. Finding it quite laborious, he invited others to assist him. Finally, a company of ten or twelve repaired to the mound, and started in digging out the mound commenced by Wiley. After penetrating this mound about 11 feet they came to a bed of limestone, that had apparently been subjected to the action of fire, they removed the stone, which was small and easy to handle, to the depth of two feet more, then they found SIX BRASS PLATES, secured and fastened together by two iron wires but which were so decayed, that they readily crumbled to dust upon being handled. The plates were so completely covered with rust as almost to obliterate the characters inscribed upon them; but after undergoing a chemical process, the inscriptions were brought out plain and distinct. There were six plates—four inches in length, one inch and three quarters wide at the top, and two inches and three quarters wide at the bottom, flaring out to points. They are four lines of characters of hieroglyphics on each; on one side of the plates are parallel lines running lengthwise. A few of the characters resemble, in their form, the Roman capital letters of the alphabet—for instance, the capital B and X appear very distinct. In addition, there are rude representations of three human heads on one of the plates; the largest in the middle; from this head proceed marks or rays, resembling those which usually surround the head of Christ, in the pictorial representations of his person. There is also figures of two trees with branches, one under each of the two small heads, both having a little to the right. One of the plates, has on it the figure of a large head by itself, with two points pointing directly to it.

By whom these plates were deposited there must ever remain a secret, unless some one skilled in deciphering hieroglyphics, may be found to unravel the mystery. Some pretend to say, that Smith the Mormon leader, has the ability to read them. If he has, he will confer a great favor on the public by removing the mystery which hangs over them. We learn there was a Mormon present when the plates were found, who it is said, leaped for joy at the discovery, and remarked that it would go to prove the authenticity of the Book of Mormon—which it undoubtedly will.

In the place where these plates were deposited, were also found human bones in the last stage of decomposition; also some braid, which was at first supposed to be human hair, but on a closer examination proved to be grass; probably used as a covering for the bodies deposited there; this was also in the last stage of decay. There were but few bones found in the mound; and it is believed, that it was but the burial place of a small number, perhaps of a person or a family of distinction, in ages long gone by; and that these plates contain the history of the times, or of a people, that existed far—far beyond the memory of the present race. But we will not conjecture anything about this wonderful discovery, as it is one which the plates alone can reveal.

On each side of this mound in which this discovery was made, was a mound, on one of which is a tree growing that measures two feet and a half in diameter, near the ground. Showing the great antiquity of the mounds, and of course, all that is buried within them. These mounds like others, that are found scattered all over the Mississippi valley, are in the form of a sugar loaf.

The plates above alluded to, were exhibited in this city last week, and are now, we understand, in Nauvoo, subject to the inspection of the Mormon Prophet. The public curiosity is greatly excited, and if Smith can decipher the hieroglyphics on the plates, he will do more towards throwing light on the early history of this continent, than any man now living.

THE BORDER OUTRAGE.

The Madisonian contains an official correspondence between Mr. Webster, U. S. Secretary of State, and the British Minister of State, Mr. Fox, from which it appears that the alleged outrage upon the North-Eastern Territory is regarded by our Government as a matter demanding the serious attention of the British and American Governments. Mr. Webster, transmits to Mr. Fox the official narrative, detailing the circumstances of the transaction, assures him that the conduct of the American officer is entirely approved, and says that the British constable Craven, was "treated with far greater mildness and lenity than he deserved." The following extract from the despatch of Captain Webster, the American officer, to Col. Pierce, his superior, embraces all the facts of the case:

Fort Kent, Fish River, }
March 13, 1843. }

COLONEL:—I have the honor to report, for the information of the Commander-in-Chief, that an American citizen, named Daniel Savage, was, on the morning of the 11th ult., forcibly abducted from the American territory, and carried past this point in open day light, by a constable of New Brunswick, named John Craven. On the evening of the same day the local civil authorities made a requisition upon me for assistance to enable them to protect this citizen of the State, and to execute the laws in so doing—stating that they had not sufficient civil force for the purpose, as Craven was known to be armed, and of a most determined character. Under these circumstances, deeming it my duty to furnish the required aid, I placed an officer and three men at the disposal of the State authorities, with directions to act as they might require; but, under no circumstances, to pass beyond the limits of the State, as defined by the late treaty with Great Britain of the operation of which, I may here remark, I had not the slightest doubt.

The party proceeded down the river, and on the morning of the 12th stopped on the south, or American side of the river, about two miles below the mouth of the Madawaska, at the house of a Frenchman named Hebert. Meanwhile the prisoner, Savage, escaped from the English side of the river, and fled to Hebert's for protection. The English constable pursued, and was arrested by the American constable, under the warrant of the State, on the ASSAULT and SILENCE of the river, in the attempt to rescue his prisoner, pistol in hand, threatening that he would still, if possible, force him back to the other side of the river. At the time of his arrest, Major Leonard Coombe, a justice of the peace for New Brunswick, (at whose suit Savage had been taken,) was present, and in his official capacity ordered the legally constituted authorities of Maine to desist, and directed Craven to resist them to the last. Craven then did attempt resistance in such a manner that it became necessary for the constable to call for the assistance of the party sent by me; when one of the men, a sergeant, aided the constable in quieting and securing him. He was then brought to this place, and this morning, after examination before the magistrates, was placed under bonds to appear before the court at Bangor, and was then set at liberty.

Last evening, after the above named transactions, I was called upon by Mr. James McLaughlin, warden of the recently disputed territory, who officially informed me, in the presence of other officers of the garrison, that all exercise of jurisdiction by the American authorities, over the territory lying below the mouth of Fish River, and on the south bank of the St. John, would be regarded by him, in his capacity of warden, as a violation of Her Majesty's dominions; that the treaty had not been sanctioned by act of Parliament, and was in consequence perfectly null here; and that the English still exercised all their former claims and rights upon this territory, and should do so until Parliament had sanctioned the treaty, and their Government proclaimed it throughout the Province, however long they might choose to delay this sanction and proclamation.

Mr. Fox, in his reply to Mr. Webster, says that he has received from the British authorities no information with regard to the affair. He adds that, "if it shall be found that any indication or irregularity has been committed," he has no doubt it has already been corrected by the Lieutenant Governor.

FROM MONTEVIDEO.

Captain Baker, of the brig Lawrence Copeland, at Baltimore, in 49 days from Montevideo, states that when he left that port, the inhabitants were throwing up breastworks around the town, and all the houses outside the works for the distance of half a mile were taken down to leave the plain open. Rosas, the Buenos Ayres General, with an army of 9,000 men, was supposed to be at the distance of ten or twelve miles from Montevideo preparing for an attack. No business was doing when Captain Baker left, every one being engaged in making preparations for the expected attack. The vessels were all lying idly.

Captain Lowry, of the ship Globe, which arrived here last evening, states that the invading army was under the command of Gen. Oribe.

The French and English squadrons, which were to mediate between the contending parties, were hourly expected to arrive.

Rosas had issued a proclamation, stating that no quarter will be given to any citizen of Buenos Ayres who may be found in the ranks of the enemy. Eighty officers were shot after the battle of Arroy Grande, by order of Rosas; two persons were found with their throats cut the evening previous to the sailing of the Globe. The country was in a most awful state, there being no safety for life or property.

TO THE PRESIDENCY, AND LADIES OF THE FEMALE RELIEF SOCIETY OF NAUVOO.

Beloved sisters and friends—As I shall necessarily be absent from your pleasant society, for a season, my husband not having succeeded in business in Nauvoo as he anticipated, I could not take my leave without soliciting your kind wishes and prayers for the time being, that we find it necessary to locate ourselves elsewhere, until a more favorable door is opened, for our residence with the church.

I wish also to acknowledge my grateful sense, of the much kindness, and good feelings, which has been manifested toward me, during my visit amongst you; and in return you have my sincere prayers, that the best of heaven's blessings may rest upon you; and may the cause of Humanity, benevolence, and mercy, flourish in your midst, under the benign auspices of an approving heaven, and the smiles of the Holy one of Israel. And may the heart of the widow, the fatherless, the poor, and the destitute, for whose benefit the society was organized, be made to rejoice through the means of your benevolent exertions. And feel assured, that the active energies of your minds, no power, however desirous it may be to vilify, and call in question your good name, will be able to tarnish the lustre of your good deeds, or pluck from your standard, the laurels which will be woven by the hand of gratitude as a shining trophy to your name, to all eternity.

With respect and affection, I am yours in the bands of the gospel.

SARAH M. CLEVELAND.

On the numbers being announced, the Liberator assured the 'twenty six' that their names should be inscribed upon a column in cologne-green, and handed down to posterity in the imperishable record of Irish History. The Mackenzie Case at Washington.—The New York Commercial Advertiser, of Wednesday afternoon, the 5th, has the following: We have good reason to know that the Secretary of the Navy has hitherto avoided all decisions of the Mackenzie case, that he has refrained from reading the reports of the evidence in the newspapers, and all newspaper comments and discussions thereon; being determined to keep his mind free and unprejudiced, until he should receive and have time carefully to examine, the official record of the court martial. The examination of that record, and the formation of an opinion thereon, it was supposed, would occupy at least ten days. There have been no cabinet discussions on the subject of these proceedings. This statement can be entirely relied upon.

Errors of the Press.—The most laughable blunders are sometimes occasioned by the omission of a single letter, as the following, which we extract from an English paper, very clearly shows:

A man was yesterday brought to answer a charge of having eaten a hackney coach man, for demanding more than his fare; and another was accused of having stolen a small oz out of the Bath mat; the stolen property was found in his waistcoat pocket.

A PARABLE.

BY J. R. LOWELL.

Worn and footsore was the Prophet
When he reached the holy hill;
"God has left the earth," he murmured,
"Here his presence lingers still."

"God of all the olden prophets,
Wilt thou talk of me no more?
Have I not as truly loved thee
As thy chosen ones of yore?"

"Hear me guide of my fathers,
Lo, an humble heart is mine;
By thy mercy I beseech thee,
Grant thy servant but a sign!"

Bowing then his head, he listened
For an answer to his prayer;
No loud burst of thunder followed,
Not a murmur stirred the air:

But the tuft of moss before him
Opened while he waited yet,
And from out the rock's hid bosom
Sprang a tender violet.

"God! I thank thee," said the Prophet,
"Hard of heart and blind was I,
Looking to the holy mountain
For the gift of prophecy."

"Still thou speakest with thy children Freely as in Eld sublim;
Humbleness and love and patience Give dominion over Time."

"Had I trusted in my nature,
And had faith in lowly things,
Thou thyself wouldst then have sought
—And set free my spirit's wings."

"But I looked for signs and wonders
That o'er men should give me sway;
Thirsting to be more than mortal,
I was even less than they."

"Ere I entered on my journey,
As I girt my loins to start,
Ran to me my little daughter,
Thou beloved of my heart."

"In her hand she held a flower
Like to this as like may be,
Which beside my very threshold
She had plucked and brought to me."

LIGHT SOVEREIGNS AND BAD MEASURES.

English Court of Requests.—In Battersea Churchyard there is a tombstone being the epitaph—

"Happy the children who're ordained by fate
To short labour and light weight."

This classical distich was penned by a baker upon the death of two infants, and that there might be no mistake about the matter, it is gravely stated that the two children so commemorated "died in their infancy." Even so be it of Sir Robert Peel's Income Tax Act! But our business is with the county court.

Henry Giles, the landlord of the Five Bells, in Somers town, appeared to answer the summons of one Job Johnstone, a waterman to the coach rank, in Charlton street, for the sum of three shillings and tenpence,—monies detained belonging to the plaintiff. The defendant, Henry Giles, was a thorough-going "licensed witter" of the old school, one who, like Lord North, regarded "measures more than men;" while the leary-looking plaintiff seemed the very counterpart of the hero who responded to the question, "Vy is you called watermen?" "Vy, 'cos we opens the coach-doors,"—a conclusive sort of reasoning often adopted in the House of Commons.

Mr. Dubois, Three shillings and tenpence. What is it for, Mr. Johnstone?

"Sharn't be long about that," said the plaintiff drawing his sinister hand across a nasal organ possessing any thing but the line of beauty. "I goes inter the ear man's house, the Five Bells, 'long with an old friend—werry good—I calls for a pot o' half and half, a couple o' pipes, and two screws—werry good (Laughter),—with vich of course we was served, and arter that we had another pot—werry good (Laughter),—and so the backer being out, I ses—Bill Smith, ses I, jest so, Bill Smith, ses I, afore we hooks it we'll have—"

Mr. Dubois: Hooks it, sir, what's that? (Laughter.)

Plaintiff: Lord, how green you is Hooks, it means cotton—namasing—what vulgar people calls going away. (Laughter.) Well my lord, I ses, Bill, afore we hooks it we'll just have a fly o' summat short.

The worthy commissioner was again puzzled, and made the proper enquiry. A juryman with a very Barbolphian nose said, "summ't short meant a quartum of max;" another juryman said it was a "go o' gin."

Afraid much laughter Mr. Johnstone continued—"Vell, gentlemen ye precedes to the bar, and calls for two drains, [Laughter.] Got sarved—drink it, and down I chucka a sur'rin. 'Two pots o' half-and-half,' ses I, 'is eightpence, two screws is twopence, and two drains is twopence, and that jest makes a bob.' Vell, gentlemen, the landlord takes up the sur'rin, and, arter pretendin' to weigh it, turns round, and ses, 'This year sur'rin's eightpence short.' (Laughter.) 'That be d—d,' ses I. 'Vy,' ses he, 'it's a matter o' so many grains!' 'Grains be—,' ses I; 'it's a good sur'rin and I wants my change, and I'll have it.' (Laughter.) Saying o' this I knocks over a glass, and trying to catch it knocks the bottom off another. (Roars of Laughter.) 'That jest makes three and twopence,' ses he, and chucka down sixteen and-up-pence on the bar. 'Werry good,' ses I, 'and if I don't summons you for all you stop'd, may I never git drunk again—there's all.' (Laughter.) Sure enough, here's the warrant."

Mr. Dubois (laughing)—Well, Mr. Henry, Giles, what do you say? Eightpence seems a large sum to deduct. Did you weigh the sovereign by a proper medium?

"Naw, sir," replied Giles, I weighed it meself wid a pair o' scales; (laughter) and may the devil take the inventor, I say, it's cost me more trouble thin all!"

Mr. Dubois.—Answer my question, my good man. What sort of weights did you use, and what scales?

"Sure thin, my lord, me own baccy scales, and divil a weight at all." (Roars of laughter.)

Mr. Giles was invited to explain.

"Certainly, me lord," said he, "I takes the man's sur'rin and puts it into one scale, and I takes a brann speck new gouden sur'rin as had never seen the day's light, and puts it into the other, and howdus up the pair o' 'em. Up goes Joey Johnstone's sur'rin, and down goes mine.— (Laughter.) Down I claps a sixpence on the light gentleman—no go! Immense laughter. Thin a fourpenny bit, and thin another, and thin the scale would'n go down. 'Me fine fellow,' ses I, 'this is a mighty light gould coin of yours, but in regard of me respecting you, I'll give it another trial, and so I throws in another fourpenny bit, and sure enough down came the scale—(roars of laughter)—r-ale good weight,' ses I, 'me friend, and jest eighteen-pence to the bad,' and then the ungrateful blackerd would'n believe me. As soon as the laughter had in some degree subsided, a juryman inquired whether the identical sovereign was in court, and being answered in the negative, it was decided that the claim of eighteen pence must be disallowed, or rather refunded."

"But surely I'll be paid for me broken glass!" inquired Giles.

"Certainly," said the Juryman.

"Vait a bit," rejoined Mr. Johnstone. "Vot sort o' glasses was they?"

"Two half quarten glasses, sure, and you knocked the bottoms off ivi both ivi em, and took away the tops wid you," said Mr. Giles.

"And is these here the hidential glasses?" inquired Mr. Johnstone, producing a couple of bottomless glasses.

"The very same," answered Giles.

"Both o' 'em half-quarten glasses, same as you serves the customers with hays!"

"Both the very same, brother and sister," replied Giles.

"Then," said Johnstone, addressing the jury, "what a waggon this here fellow must be! On my solid hoath these 'ear glasses are reglar three others, and if so be Mister Dubois will send for a quarter o' gin in a minute, you'll find jest a glass a piece." [The jury of three laughed most immoderately.]

Mr. Dubois, however, declined "standing," and the jury, after a slight consideration, directed Mr. Giles to refund all the money excepting only the price of the two pots of half-and-half and the two screws!

Mr. Dubois observed that the subject of light gold had become a perfect nuisance! Whereupon a political-looking bystander, whose garments spoke most eloquently of the "light of other days," observed "tha he didn't feel the inconvenience of 'light gold' half so much as the prevailing greed scarcity o' silver." [Roars of laughter.]

Mr. Dubois observed, that he hadn't the slightest doubt of it.

From the National Intelligencer.

IMPROVEMENTS IN THE LOOM FOR WEAVING FIGURED FABRICS.

Messrs. Editors:—A patent was obtained about a year since by Mr. C. G. Gilroy, now of New York, for improvements in the power loom for weaving figured goods of various kinds, either of silk, wool, linen, or cotton; which looms are now in successful operation. The writer has seen specimens of the work executed upon them from each of the materials, some of them in a style which the manufacturers of Lyons would not be ashamed to own, and of a texture differing from every previous manufacture.

Mr. Gilroy has spent a number of years in France, England, Belgium, and Prussia, in which countries he has obtained upwards of thirty patents for various improvements in the manufacture of textile substances; and he has in his possession the highest testimonials from the first manufacturers of France, and from others eminent in judgement and station, showing the estimation in which his improvements are held in that land of art and taste. Mr. Gilroy has recently deposited in the Patent Office another model, exhibiting various new improvements in the loom, and which is intended for the weaving of table cloths, shawls, piano forte covers, window curtains, and other articles of a similar character. By the action of this loom the business of weaving will be much facilitated, as by its means he will be enabled to work that instrument at the rate of from eighty to a hundred and thirty picks a minute, and to produce perfect works in patterns of great complexity. For the "Neighbor."

MANUFACTURING STRAW.

This business will probably appear trifling to some, and more particularly so to those who are least acquainted with it; but as the little streams and rivulets supply their place in filling the ocean, so will the manufacturing of straw fill its place in the great manufacturing wheel.

Owing to the great tide of emigration here, and the scarcity of flax and rolls, many of our girls are becoming like the lilies of the field; "they neither toil nor spin," but straw is an article that can easily be obtained, sufficient to enable every girl to make her own bonnets and pappas and brothers' hats; then she may look with pleasure upon the beauty and workmanship of her own hands. From the experience I have had in this business, and from observing the industrious and persevering habits of the people of our city, I am thoroughly convinced that the only thing requisite, in order that this branch of business shall be carried to as flourishing an extent here as in any of the eastern countries, is, that some who have a little capital would step forward and buy all the braid they can get, then get it made into hats and bonnets. It can be as well and as neatly done here as anywhere else. This would give employment to many a widow and orphan and I may say to a great share of the females in the place, and raise them from need and want to comfort and plenty. One reason why this business would be so advantageous, is because it is so simple; any child at six or seven years of age can easily learn it and earn enough to clothe themselves neatly; another is, there will be no difficulty in procuring the materials. The season is near for gathering straw, and I hope it will be well improved by our citizens. The straw from grain sown in the spring is preferred. It ought to be cut a few days after it is in the blossom, or just as the kernel is filled, before it begins to ripen. It should then be thoroughly scalded with boiling water; then spread them where the sun will shine fair upon them. This should be continued four or five days, with the exception of scalding, being careful to take them in, in case of a shower, or at night, to prevent the dew falling upon it, then cut it between every joint, slip off the husk, scald it with clean soap suds; then put it in a barrel, if you have no whitening box, and burn lime stone under it. Three or four smokes is sufficient for straw; it is then fit for use.

More Outrages on American Vessels.—The brig Ceylon, Capt. Dayley, arrived at Salem on the 23d ult. brings accounts of more outrages on American vessels by British boarding officers. The Register states that the Captain of the Ceylon reports that the bark Roderick Dhu, of Providence, Capt. Richard T. Sims, was at Acera, December, 10, to sail for windward coast. Capt. Sims had been boarded by an officer of H. B. M. brig Spy, and treated in a most shameful and insulting manner, inasmuch that Capt. S. had felt bound to make a representation of the case to the British commandant of the station. The same officer boarded the Ceylon the day after, and Capt. Dayley states that he was so selfish in his appearance he would not invite him into his cabin. The officer, however, did not wait for an invitation, but when Capt. D. went for his papers as demanded, followed him into the cabin of his own accord. —St. Louis Gazette.

Erie Canal.—The Buffalo Gazette says the breach in the Erie Canal, at Tonawanda, will be repaired by the first of May, at which time, the canal will be opened for navigation.

Wisconsin.—The Legislature and Executive of this Territory, are still in hot water. The Legislature has contended that it was holding an adjourned session, and Doty, with all the obsequy of long ears, has refused to co-operate with it except as a special session convened under his proclamation. In this beligerent condition, they have continued for twenty days. The following from the Milwaukee Courier, shows the point to which they have arrived:—Chicago Dem.

"Mr. Martin introduced, yesterday, resolutions that protested against the usurpations and assumptions of the Governor and declared the Legislature were right in the course they had pursued; yet, declared, nevertheless, that to secure some necessary legislative action to the people of the Territory, the journals of both Houses be so altered as to conform to the wishes of the Executive. After the arrival of the mail and the receipt of intelligence of the passage of the election law, the question was taken, and the resolutions passed both houses. Immediately after the final vote was taken in the Council, Mr. Strong resigned his station as president of that body."

LATER FROM CHINA.

(Great Riot and Fire at Canton.)

By the ship Delhi, from China, the N. York Journal of Commerce has received Canton papers to December 13, and Hong Kong to the 15th, being a fortnight later than the previous advices. The Delhi left Canton December 20.

There was an alarming riot at Canton on the 7th, in which the foreign factories were set on fire, and much damage done. We give the following particulars:

In a very few minutes a most vigorous attack was made upon No. 1 British, which was carried by numbers entering the lower windows. There can be no doubt that this factory was attacked in this sudden manner, in the hope and expectation of capturing two ladies that were residing there. These ladies, most fortunately, had been removed immediately it was seen that the Co's. garden was broken open, and being taken out the back way, were deposited on one of the hoops.

The attack was so sudden that most of the other residents believed that the object had been accomplished, and the ladies captured. Neither residents or domestics saved a single article, but what they stood in. The long merchants, at the earnest request of some residents, had sent for soldiers to some station outside the walls near the factories, but the Mandarin thereof of course knowing the row would be more serious than was generally contemplated, considered his force insufficient, and refusing to act, referred the application to the Quang heep.

This functionary, knowing right well that something serious would happen, applied to the Governor to be allowed to arm his force "cap-a-pie," as he could not take life without the Governor's permission, knowing that the ordinary mode of quieting a disturbance would be unavailing in the present instance. The Governor refused his sanction, and the Quang-heep went accompanied by the Quang-chow-foo and Nam-boy-yune escorted by about 300 soldiers, armed to the teeth.

The soldiers fired up in the air, and the mob finding that they durst not fire amongst them attacked and drove them off, breaking the chairs of the three great Mandarins and pelled them with stones. Consequently the Mandarin took refuge in the Cossou houses, which the soldiers guarded. It was now about 8 o'clock—the mob had set fire to the Co's. hall, and commenced pillaging and destroying all the factories eastward of Hong Lane.

All these factories have now been pillaged and deserted excepting No. 1 Dutch. This factory, having an immense amount of money in its treasury, was bravely defended by its inhabitants, who, falling short of ammunition, and the factory being in a blaze, evacuated it about 11 o'clock. The residents of the factory to the westward, finding the square in possession of a ruthless mob, elated with success, had to look after their own personal safety. Those between Hong Lane and old China street, took refuge on the tops of their houses, expecting every moment to find their factories on fire, and hoped by climbing over the roof to gain access to the back streets.

They did not seem bent upon 'loot,' as they broke and destroyed everything, of course seizing all the money that fell in their way. No. 1 British, adjoining the Hall, next caught fire, and the Hong merchants sent their engines to prevent the fire spreading. The mob would not allow them to work; saying that they were determined that all the factories eastward of Hong Lane should be burned, but that if any others caught, they would assist them in quenching them.

These gentlemen could not go out as the mob was frantic before the doors. Those to the eastward of that again, at the entreaty of the Hong merchants, made their escape at the back doors, and being conveyed through the streets to wards the westward, were deposited for the night in the Shamun pack houses. Some took refuge in Minqua's hong, and were in momentary expectation of being attacked.

It was fortunate that the immense amount of dollars which were under the embers of the burnt factories diverted the attention of the mob, or there can be no doubt that all the factories would have shared the like fate.

For although it was evident, that the political part of it were satisfied with what they had done, when they saw all in a blaze eastward of Hong Lane, yet all the bad characters of Canton having by this time assembled, a great number consisted of those who came after 'loot.' Things remained in this state until about 2, when, strange to say, the mob began to disperse. Soon after, the Quang-keep having received the Governor's authority to do as he liked, came to the square and soon dispersed what remained.

All the next day the fire continued, and the following day early, Sir Hugh Gough anchored off the factories in the Ste. Proserpine. Orders were immediately sent to Hongkong for 2,000 troops, but nothing had yet arrived, at Monday 2 P. M. The square is now entirely in the possession of the Chinese soldiers, who have made an encampment thereon, but are much apprehensive of a fresh attack, and it is said have applied to Sir Hugh for his co-operation.

The back streets are much crowded, and foreigners cannot walk in them. Parties are still shipping off tea. The people, it is said, have petitioned the Governor to be firm, and they will assist him in carrying on the war with the British. All are anxiously waiting for Sir Henry. Howqua is quite alive to take every advantage of the present state of things, and has quadrupled the rent of the factories that remain.

The day after the disturbance, two of the rioters were executed in the square, and it is said a number more have been captured, and are to share the same fate.

The boats conveying the right wing of her Britannic Majesty's 62d regiment to Dinapore were swamped in a hurricane on the 5th of September, and the Madras Spectator states that the loss is ascertained to be two lieutenants, Gassan and Scobell, five sergeants, four corporals, and thirty-five privates, with six women and twelve children.

The brig Maulmein was wrecked on the 29th of September at the north end of the Palawan passage, and with her were lost chief officer Smith, third officer Ranken, four lascars and the despatches.

Sir Henry Pottinger has issued a proclamation stating that 283 of the crews of two British vessels, which had been wrecked on the Island of Formosa, had been massacred, and disclosing an intention of claiming atonement from the Emperor for the outrage.

Letter from Havana.—By a letter in the Picayune, dated Havana, April 1st, we learn that a furious out-break of the negroes took place on the 25th ult. at Cimarona and Bemp, near Cardenas, on the North side of the island. The blacks rose to the number of 600 and furiously commenced a work of death and destruction on property holders and property. The authorities and whites in the neighborhood were not slow to arrest their murderous and devastating career; but before they succeeded, four white men fell victims to their fury; two soldiers were wounded, and five estates were laid waste by fire. The soldiers and whites from the neighboring plantations hurried to the rescue in such numbers that the destructionists were compelled to retreat. They fell back upon a wood, where several of them had been found hanged, they having acted, themselves, their own executioners. Some of them have been arrested, and the remainder were, at the last account, besieged, and their escape rendered impossible. The injury which property has sustained at their hands is said to equal $300,000. When the news of the insurrection reached Havana, 400 rank and file of the 2d regiment were immediately despatched on board a frigate of war steamer to the scene of action. As the flight of the black insurgents was, however, effected before they reached there, their assistance was not needed, and they immediately returned.

The U. S. brig Bainbridge, Capt. Johnson, arrived in this port yesterday, in 14 days from Port au Prince. From the news she brings it appears that Hayti is no exception to the general rule of revolutions never going backward. The reports that President Boyer was driven to take refuge on board an English ship of the line, to save himself from popular fury, and that he sailed for the island of Jamaica, is fully confirmed.

LATEST FROM CAMPECHE.—By the schooner, Capt. Churchill, which left Sinal on the 31st ult., we have dates from the seat of war up to the 30th.

The Mexican fleet landed a large body of troops at Tlilchaca on the 26th and 27th March, after having previously visited Selina, which place was burnt by the Mexican soldiers. The first place of interest was expected to be Sinal, off which the Mexican fleet was hourly expected. A body of Yucatan troops numbering some 4500, had been detailed to meet the Mexicans.

A brief action occurred in the neighborhood of Campeche on the 26th of March, in which the Mexicans sustained considerable loss. The Campechanos, after a three hours' fight retired in good order, without effecting anything.

The cannonading continued upon the city from the Mexican batteries, but little damage has been done so far.

Despatches from the Mexican camp were continually joining the Yucatanos.—N. O. Pic. of the 7th inst.

Mexico.—A slip from the office of the Panama Gazette, dated April 5th, says: "The United States ship of war Falmouth, Commodore James McIntosh, arrived here on the 5th inst., in eight days from Vera Cruz with important dispatches from our Minister, General Thompson. The United States ship Vincennes, Commander Buchanan, the Spanish brig of war Patriot, Commodore Luro, and the United States revenue cutter Woodbury, Captain Woodbury, was at anchor under the Island of Sacrificios, when the F. sailed—the latter was to sail the next day for New Orleans, with about $100,000 on board. The officers and crew of the Falmouth are in excellent health, there has not been a serious case of sickness on board since she has been last in commission.

It was stated that Santa Anna, on his arrival in the city of Mexico, had ordered all the Mexican and Mexican prisoners to be shot, but the Mexican order was countermanded. He had dismissed all the Ministers and appointed others in their places—great dissatisfaction had been expressed in some of the western provinces, but no open act of hostility to his measures had as yet taken place. He had placed an additional duty on the exportation of specie so as to make it cost 16 cents to get a dollar from Mexico to Europe or the United States, and 9 cents from Vera Cruz and Tampico. He has ordered 1500 troops to be raised, and recalled Gen. Minon from the command of the siege going on against the Campechanos and placed him in confinement at Vera Cruz. Santa Anna, is in fact President Congress, etc.

Schooner Watchman from Metamoros.—The schooner Watchman from Metamoros, and the Laura Virginia from Campeche, arrived at New Orleans on the 23d ult., bringing the following items of intelligence:

Everything is quiet at Metamoros, and along the Rio del Norte above.

About 1000 Mexican troops were in Metamoros, and about 2000 more at different posts above.

Gen. Woll was at Monterey. The Texian prisoners had been marched into the interior. A report had been in circulation, but not generally accredited, that 30 of them had been shot on the road.

There was no talk of invading Texas. The Laura Virginia brings no news of any more fighting at Campeche, but fully confirms the victory obtained by the Yucatanos over the Mexicans on the 4th inst.

The Mexican steamers had gone from Campeche to Vera Cruz for the purpose of bringing reinforcements to the Mexicans.

Massachusetts.—The intelligence received of the election of Mr. Hudson, in the Fifth Congressional district, is confirmed. There is also a rumor that Mr. Rockwell is elected in the seventh, but the returns are not sufficiently complete to enable us to judge correctly in the matter. In the other districts there is no choice

MY SISTER'S TOMB.

BY MRS. SOPHIA J. SMITH.

I stood beside my sister's tomb,
Viewing that solemn, sacred spot.
Where she, who once with health did bloom,
In silence lay, to be forgot!
I thought how soon do earthly joys
Fly from our grasp, and have an end:
A fleeting show, like empty toys—
God only is a lasting friend!

I thought upon the sunny smile,
Which oft had play'd upon her face,
Those eyes, which spoke so artful guile,
Which still, by memory, I could trace.
I paused to ask: Has this fair form,
Which lies beneath this mould'ring sod,
Departed, never to return?
And breathed a pray'r, forbid it God!

And then I heard the spirit's voice,
In accents sweet, pronounce the words:
She sleeps; but shall with thee rejoice
In Christ, the Savior, Lord of Lords!
I, too, like her, must be brought low
And meet the cold embrace of death:
Oh, God! wilt thou thy mercy show
To me, in the last struggling breath!

And at the resurrection morn,
When all who die in Christ shall rise,
O, may we, by thy grace, be born,
And wait to meet thee in the skies;
And with our bodies as restor'd,
Bene to its bone, thy glory see,
And feel thy spirit on us pour'd,
When changed to immortality.

REMARKABLE.

On the 26th day of March as I was on my journey with my team, from Woodstock (the place of my nativity) to Burlington N. Y., on the evening of the 27th, I put up at the house of Capt. J. Bissel, iron holder in Chelsea. I retired to my lodgings at an early hour. A few minutes before the clock struck one, as I conceived, I awoke, and turning my eyes towards the window, beheld an uncommon gleam of light, which induced me to leap from my bed. I looked out, but nothing uncommon appeared. I again got into bed, when, after some time, I was surprised at something resembling a field piece, and the clashing of swords, as I conceived, which I saw through the window. At the same instant a bright light appeared in the room, as though the moon in the height of its lustre had shown directly upon me. I then raised myself in bed, but immediately sunk back with terror and surprise, and lay some minutes motionless. At length me thought I heard an audible voice, which I conceived not human, call me by name, and said, "Arise and give ear to the message of heaven, for you shall be a witness of the signs which shall be given of the perilous days which are coming upon the world, by reason of the innumerable sins and iniquities so prevalent among mankind; especially in this favored land; forasmuch the Lord I have delivered this people like the children of Israel from the tyranny of a powerful nation, and would have gathered them as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, but they would not hearken to the voice of wisdom; they have become a rebellious and disobedient people, fustling, as it were, after the luxuries of Egypt; boasting in their strength; pregnant with evils innumerable; but their peace is destroyed. In wars and rumors of wars shall they abound, both national and civil. The father shall raise against the son and the son against the father, for a great and powerful nation have I chosen to be a scourge unto all other nations of the earth; even the most haughty shall bow to them, for the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong. By an Almighty arm all nations of the earth shall be made to know the Most High reigneth. This great nation shall lay waste your sea-ports and utterly destroy your navigation. She shall infect your sea coasts with the fleets of all the conquered nations, and her armies shall swarm around you like the flies and gnats of Egypt, for a season, until they (ye) know the Lord giveth and he taketh at his pleasure. And for a sign of these times you shall be a witness of the angel's descending with a long flaming sword in his hand which shall turn to every point to prepare the way for ushering in the glorious day. Then shall the sword be transformed into an olive branch, which shall arise and overspread the horizon and appear as emblematical of the harmonious day in which all nations and languages shall be gathered into one family, and all become of one heart and mind, to serve under the peaceable government of Him whose sceptre sways all worlds." After such a discourse, which I conceived more than human, neither pen nor tongue can describe the agitation of my mind, though I could not but consider myself as highly favored in being a hearer of the divine message. As the clock struck three I arose from my bed and proceeded on my journey. I had not got on my way more than a mile and a half before my team was instantly stopped as though pushed by a mighty hand. I unthinkingly bid them go on, but without effect, for that instant a bright light appeared to overspread the horizon and an angel descended and stood erect in the air but a little distance from me dressed in a long, unsullied robe, with a flaming sword in his hand. I can say with Daniel, "I was alone and without thought." He said unto me, "stand on thy feet and give ear unto the words which I shall speak," and as I stood trembling and recollecting the vision which I saw a few hours before. I lifted up my eyes and beheld his face which had the appearance of lightning, and his eyes were as lamps of fire. The sword which he held to appearance was about thirty feet long, the hilt of which was variously set or ornamented, appeared of pure gold, set with stones of various hues, the blade resembled flaming fire, and I cast up my eyes and beheld a bow in the clouds beautifully variegated, much resembling a rainbow encircling sixteen stars, though differently diversified, there being nine to the southern part of the bow of a most beautiful azure, in the centre of which bow I suppose appeared an olive branch richly decorated with golden buds. The stars to the north were of a deep crimson and all very transparent and brilliant which afterwards separated ted the nine of the azure fell to the south and the seven of the crimson to the north, attended with a heavy rumbling noise in the air, like the rushing of many armies to battle, at which I fell with my face to the ground. At length me thought I heard an audible voice articulate and say, "all these are signs by which you shall know what is to befall the nations now in the latter days. Woe unto the inhabitants of the land, for their sins and ingratitude. Wars and rumors of wars shall then abound; their fields shall be crimsoned with the blood of their own citizens and nothing but lamentation and mourning shall be heard to echo through the lonely vale, until all the tates and brambles of the earth shall be plucked up and demelinated from the face thereof, by the pestilence which walks in darkness, and by the sword which lays waste at noon day, for there shall be such a destruction as shall greatly thin the inhabitants of the earth both by war, pestilence, and famine, until after there shall arise a branch from the root of Jesse, who shall perform such remarkable things through the power of Almighty God, as shall effectually convince the world of his divine authority, and shall cause, eventually, the remnant of all nations to be of one heart and one mind in religion, when there shall be no more wars among mankind, who will ever after live in the sweetest bonds of mutual friendship, passing on unto love, to God and one another. Then Jew and Gentile shall coincide in sentiment and become one and indivisible; declaring Jesus Christ to be their only king and sovereign;" and, as he ended, proclaimed, "Father, thy will be done on earth as in heaven, and may all the people say Amen." As he spoke these words I looked up and beheld the sword which he held transformed into an olive branch which grew and overspread the horizon, under which a reflection of light presented to my view a large and spacious landscape with an innumerable host of beings like unto the stars of heaven for number, worshipping and praising Him who is king over all. There the lion lay down with the lamb and the beasts of the earth, and the fowls of the air, were mingled together in concert, and nothing but love and unutterable joy appeared among them, and as from the landscape ascended a voice, proclaiming, "Glory to God in the Highest; peace on earth and good will towards men;" at the echo of which, I fell on my face in amazement and terror.

NEW ORLEANS MARKET.

Saturday, April 8, 1843.
Cotton.—The sales on Wednesday last were reported at 6,000 bales; Thursday 4,500 bales; and yesterday 4,000; together 14,500 bales. Prices are rather firmer, in consequence of the small stock on sale, and a decline in freights. We are likely to have light receipts for a few weeks, and prices may be maintained until later European accounts get to hand. The weather having cleared off, will give an opportunity to our planters to plant their crops, and with a late fall make a average crop of cotton. Our quotations we do not alter, but remark that for the strict qualities the outside figures have to be paid.

SUGAR.—The demand for this article continues good, and the advance recently noticed is fully sustained. We continue former figures, viz: 3-12 a 3-4 for ordinary to middling, 3-8 for fair, 4-5 for prime, and 5-12 for a strictly prime article.

MOLASSES.—The demand continues good at 15 a 16 cts. The stock on sale is limited.

FLOUR.—The receipts of this article continue light, being hardly sufficient to meet the demand for city consumption, so that our former quotations are not only maintained, but in many instances, holders have been able to obtain 3-13 to 3-14 advance, and the market is decidedly firmer than it has been for some time past. We quote superfine $4 per bbl, and some are holding at $4.50.

SALT.—Since our last review of the market, there is no change in this article—1500 sacks coarse Liverpool, per ship Clifton, at 90c. In Turkey Island there is nothing doing.

RICE.—A good demand continues, and supply ample. Prices range at 2-3-8 a 2-5-8 c per lb.

DEMOCRATIC MEETING IN ROCK ISLAND COUNTY.

At a meeting of the Democrats of Rock Island County, held at the Court House, pursuant to public notice on Saturday the 29th day of April 1843, for the purpose of electing delegates to attend a district convention, to be held at Rock Island, in Rock Island County Illinois, on the 4th Monday in May next, for the purpose of selecting a candidate to be run on the democratic ticket to represent us in the next Congress of the United States, from this district.

On motion, Co. John Buford was called to the chair, and John R. Taylor chosen secretary.

The chair in a few appropriate remarks explained the object of the meeting.

On motion, Resolved, That a committee of three, be appointed by the chair, to suggest for the consideration of this meeting the names of four suitable persons to be put in nomination as delegates to said district convention.

Whereupon said committee was appointed, and after retiring a few minutes returned, and recommended the following named gentlemen, Messrs. William Marshal Sen. John Buford, Joseph Knox and Daniel G. Moore, who were unanimously elected delegates to represent the Democracy of Rock Island County, in the said convention to be held at Rock Island on the fourth Monday in May next, and that they be authorized to fill all vacancies which may occur in their own body.

The following resolution was unanimously passed:

Resolved, That this convention has the utmost confidence in the eminent ability and talents, and strict political integrity of our esteemed fellow citizen and democrat, Joseph Knox Esq. that we consider him as the best qualified among the able and distinguished gentlemen of the democratic party, whose names are before the public for the honor of a nomination for Congress, and that our delegates be instructed to vote in the Congressional convention for Joseph Knox, and to use their utmost exertions to procure his nomination.

Resolved, That the proceedings of this meeting be published in the Upper Mississippi, Galena Sentinel, Nauvoo papers, and other democratic papers in the district.

Meeting adjourned.
JOHN BUFORD, Chairman.
JOHN R. TAYLOR, Secretary.

THE INDIANS.

Of the immense Indian population that but a few years since occupied land between the Atlantic and the Mississippi river, there is now, according to the most recent authentic statistics preserved in the Indian department at Washington—in lower Michigan about 5000 of the tribes of Chippewas and Ottawas; in Wisconsin about 5800 Menomones and Oneidas; in Ohio, about 375 Wyandots; in Indiana about 900 Miamies and Pottowatomies; in Mississippi, about 5350 Chickasaws and Choctaws; about 11000 Cherokees still scattered over the States of North Carolina, Alabama, and Tennessee; some Chippewas south and West of Lake Superior, whose number is unknown; some Oneidas, originally from New York, near Green Bay, in Wisconsin Territory; a small remnant of the Seminoles in Florida; a few scattered through New England; a remnant of the Brothertown and Stockbridge tribes on Winnebago lake, and a more nominal band that still linger on the banks of the Catawba in S. Carolina. These scattered fragments of the great Indian family, that owned and inhabited the land east of the Mississippi river, are all that are left to tell the story of their former dominion and greatness in that wide expanse of Territory.—Boston Bee.

Suum cuique tributo.

The Mayor's office is kept in the 2d story of the brick store on the corner of Water and Granger Streets. Offenders sued quickly for tribute, are dealt with according to law and evidence, and such other business duly attended to; as the peace, harmony, and benefit of the city may require. Entrance at the south door.

MAYOR'S CLERK.

HAVE on hand a few bonnets, and have of late had a number of applications to buy braid, but have not had means to pay for it; this has induced me to make the following proposals, and solicit the patronage of all those who wish to encourage manufacturing at home, and assist each other. I will take in exchange for hats and bonnets, flax, wool, or clothing grain of all kinds, and almost all kinds of produce; money not refused; and will buy braid either for hats or bonnets, and pay in the same articles that I shall be able to get. The grain I may receive I shall be able to make into meal and flour. I shall cheerfully oblige all who may favor me with their custom, as far as my limited circumstances will admit; and regret that I cannot do more; for were it in my power I would gladly give employment to all that seek it, until the great western market should be supplied by our industry at Nauvoo.

Foreign.

Progress of the Revolution Hayti.—By the brig Fairfield, Capt. Smith which arrived last evening in thirteen days from Port au Prince, we learn that the main body of the insurgents were at Lisgoe, twenty miles from the former place, in a strong position, awaiting the result of the expedition which had been sent against Aux Cayes, after some hard fighting. This completed the triumph of the insurgents throughout the island. Having accomplished the object for which it was sent, the expedition was on its return to Lisgoe. On its arrival there, the insurgent army, comprising 15,000 men, would march upon Port au Prince. President Boyer was doing what he could to prepare for their reception, by strengthening the forts about the city, digging trenches, &c. His force, however, was only about 4,000 men. Four days prior to the sailing of the Fairfield, he issued a proclamation, that all females who wished could go on board the shipping, or retire in the country. Previous to that announcement no person could leave the city. The general opinion was, that Boyer had no chance of successful resistance. The mass of the people are against him, and attribute most of the evils which they suffer, to the severity of the government.

The revolution had caused a complete stagnation of business; no produce coming in, &c. Most of the merchants had embarked their valuables on board the vessels in the harbor, except the English, who have put all their goods under protection of the British flag. The U. S. brig Bainbridge, Capt. Johnson, was at Port au Prince, and would remain there to protect American interests, until the contest should be decided.—Journal Com.

Islands of the Pacific.—It is reported, that with a view to counteract the influence of France, growing out of its recent acquisitions in the Pacific, the English have resolved to take possession, if it should not be too late, of the Isles of Osnabrock. The Four Crowns, &c. situated to the south of the Marquesas Islands, as well as the Isle of Jesus, at the north-west of those islands. These situations are regarded of great importance as points of observation.

If, however, the English expedition, on its arrival at these several places, finds them already in possession of the French, it will content itself with seizing on the other unoccupied points as it shall consider most favorable.—Id.

The great iron steamer.—The great iron steamer, the largest vessel ever built, intended to ply between this country and New York, is now complete, except her decorative part; and she will be enabled to go to sea, it is believed, in the spring of the present year. The following details respecting her, can hardly fail to prove interesting in the United States, where she will soon be an object of wonder.

She will be capable of accommodating 300 first class passengers in fore and after cabins, and of carrying 1500 tons of merchandise and upwards.

Her accommodations will be perfect as ample space, ingenuity, the fine arts, and the best of taste can produce. She will be appointed and fitted with every invention relating to steamships which the present generation has introduced.

The following are her dimensions, with detailed particulars of the iron used in her construction:

Length, 320 feet

Beam, 51 do

Total depth, 31 do 4 in.

Draught, when loaded 16 do

Tonnage, 1500 tons

Engines, 4, of 300 horse power each.

The plates of the keel are one inch thick, and all the plates under water are five-eighths to half an inch thick at the top, except the upper plate, which is five-eighths. She is clinker built and double riveted throughout; towards the extremities and quite aloft the thicknesses are reduced gradually to 7-16ths. The ribs are framed of angle iron, 6 inches by 3 1/2, by half an inch thick at the bottom of the vessel, and 7-16ths at the top; the mean distance of the ribs from center to center is 14 inches, and all these ribs will be doubled; the distance is then increased to 18 inches, and then gradually to 21 inches at the extremities. The boiler platform is of plate iron, supported upon ten iron kelsons, of which the center ones are 5 feet 3 inches deep; these kelsons are formed like the flooring of iron plates placed on the edge. The hull is divided into five distinct compartments, by means of water tight bulkheads. The decks five in number, consist of the cargo deck, and an intermediate one of iron and two cabin decks, 7 inches thick, and an upper deck, 5 inches thick, of wood; these are strengthened and supported longitudinally by three courses of wood, upright pillars, 9 inches in diameter, running from the kelsons to the uppermost deck. Her rigging is hermaphrodite, with six masts, the whole of which, excepting the mainmast, (which is square rigged), towers, as occasion requires, on a level with deck, being secured at their bases in hinged sockets of a firm and rigid construction. She will be propelled by Smith's patent Archimedeal screw, of the proper power and size required by the four engines of 1200 horse power, which are to work it. These engines are splendid specimens of mechanism, as complete as they can be manufactured, and have been placed in the vessel at right angles, for the purpose of their working to suit her build, and for the better distribution of their dead weight. There are six boilers, with four feeders to each.

TURKEY.

Intelligence of the storming and capture of Kerkelah by the Turkish forces, mostly composed of regular troops, under the orders of Mezib Pacha, reached Constantinople, by Tartar, on the 6th ult. This event, calculated to produce a religious war between Persia and the Porte, took place upon the 13th ultimo, after twenty days resistance on the part of the inhabitants and pilgrims, aided by a few irregular troops. A breach having been effected by Nezib's artillery, consisting of some heavy guns served by the artillery of the Imperial Guard, which marched from Constantinople last summer, the assault was commenced, and, after stout opposition, the Turkish troops, penetrated into the body of the place. Here, however, they still encountered a bold hand-to-hand resistance from the Persians, until at last the discipline of the assailants prevailed over the disorderly efforts of the defenders, and the usual deplorable results of a storm ensued. Nezib Pacha had issued orders, it is said, to his officers, forbidding pillage or outrage; but those who are acquainted with the consequences of carrying a place by storm, even when the assailants are composed of troops perfectly disciplined, may picture to themselves the horrors that were committed by the Turkish battalions, who, in addition to half discipline and excessive thirst for plunder, were animated by fanatic religious zeal against men whom they hold to be the deadly enemies of the Shiite faith, and this is the very sanctuary of the Sheah creed. Order, it is affirmed, was, with difficulty, reestablished, upon the following morning, and the sheiks, imams, and munitaries having made full submission, a portion of the troops were withdrawn, after occupying all the principal posts, and establishing several pieces of cannon in battery opposite the most frequented thoroughfares. The first step of the fanatic Pacha was to fulfil the object of his expedition. The Sheah priests were expelled from the mosques and temples—the celebration of Namaz after the rites of the disciples of Ali was forbidden—Shiite imams were installed in the places of the former, and upon the Friday immediately following the assault the Turkish Imam Khatib mounted the pulpit (Minbar) and leaning upon a sword, symbolical of the capture of the place by storm, recited the prayer Khotba, which contains an invocation for blessings upon all orthodox sultans, and especially for the reigning monarch, and by implication declares all other sovereigns and sectarians to be heretical and unworthy of divine grace. The sanctity of the city of Kerkelah, in the eyes of all Persians, in short of all those professing the Sheah faith, is known to all persons having any acquaintance with the east.

The hope that peace had at last been concluded between the Druses and the Christians of Mount Lebanon has proved delusive, and the belligerents appear now to be on the eve of a more exterminating war than before. The Maronites appear to have given up the cause of the Druses and have joined the Turks. An engagement had taken place in which the Druses were defeated. Several of their chiefs fled to the Haouran tribe; but instead of receiving the protection they expected, these mountaineers, to gratify an old pique, took them prisoners and gave them up to the Turkish authorities, in whose custody they now remain.

ALGERIES.—The war appears to be going on against Abdel Kader with a good deal of animation, but with very doubtful effect. The French bulletins proclaim various successes for their arms; but they have done the same thing for the last three years, and still the wily Arab chieftain very nearly holds his own.

TEXAS.—By the arrival at New Orleans of the steam-packet New York, we have Galveston dates to the 20th ultimo. From former advices it appeared, that Judge Robinson, one of the Texas prisoners captured by General Wall at San Antonio, and been entrusted with official propositions for an accommodation between the two countries. By this arrival the terms of the proposed arrangement have transpired, and are as follows:

Galveston, March 27 1843.

To the Editor of the Times:

Sir, A few hours since I arrived here from Vera Cruz via New Orleans, and will leave immediately for Washington, to lay before his excellency the President, the basis upon which the war between Mexico and Texas may possibly be terminated; which basis or propositions emanate from and bear the signatures of General Santa Anna, President of Mexico.

1st. It is proposed that Texas should acknowledge the sovereignty of Mexico.

2d. A general act of amnesty to be passed for past acts in Texas.

3d. Texas to form an independent department of Mexico.

4th. Texas to be represented in the general Congress.

5th. Texas to institute or originate all local laws, rules, and regulations.

6th. No Mexican troops under any pretext whatever to be stationed in Texas.

These are the principal bases of a projected treaty and other important points to be submitted to the President and the people; and, if they should be adopted by them, will give us, among other important advantages, peace and a release of our countrymen now in prison, and a market for our staple product, cotton, at 25 cents per pound at the Mexican ports in specie, per pound at a distance from 200 to 300 miles from the coast.

In 1842 we exported 18,000 bales of cotton of 5000 lbs. each, and I presume 1843 will produce 25,000; this, at 25 cents per pound, gives $3,125,000, and allowing $5 per bale for freight and charges, you have three millions per annum to form a "hard money" currency for Texas; and I think it may be fairly estimated that our product of that article will be doubled annually for many years, growing out of the increased price, and rapidly increasing emigration; and a market would also be opened for our beef, pork, bird, butter, corn, and other articles, both in Mexico and Cuba. Time will not allow me to further dilate upon this important subject, but I give you this hasty sketch, with an assurance that the proper authority will lay the documents speedily before the public.

Respectfully your ob't servant,
JAMES W. ROBINSON.

The Galveston Citizen, which publishes the foregoing propositions, speaks of them in a decidedly favorable manner, and demands for them a serious and respectful consideration. The Times, on the other hand, remarks that—

"Whatever impressions a superficial consideration of these may excite—how ever pleased we may at the moment be with the flattering deductions of Judge Robinson founded upon them, we have no hesitation in expressing our decided conviction that upon calm and mature reflection they will be, by every reflecting Texan, consigned to the contempt which alone they merit."

The Houston Telegraph states that it has received a letter from Washington announcing that Gov. Pierce M. Butler, the commissioner on the part of the United States, had arrived with twenty men at the Waco village for the purpose of treating with the various tribes of Indians in conjunction with the commissioners of Texas.—[E. LATEST FROM EUROPE.

By the arrival of the packet ship Columbus, Captain Cole, from Liverpool of the 23d ult. we have our files of English Papers to the 22nd. [The C. has made the remarkably short passage of 22 days. The overland Mail from India and China, arrived on the 12th, with late and important intelligence from India and China.]

In Ireland and Scotland the wheat is looking remarkably well and every prospect of an abundant harvest.

The Acadia arrived on the 14th, making the passage in 12 days and 20 hours.

The Corn Laws came before the Lords on the 14th. Lord Montague moved for a select committee to enquire into the operation of the Corn Laws of the last session, but the motion was defeated by 200 to 78.

A motion of similar import, in the House of Commons was defeated the same day by 233 to 133.

On the 15th, in the Commons, Mr. Gladstone, in answer to a statement from Mr. Grogan, that a great deal of American salted meat had been imported into Liverpool, through Canada, said that if this had been done it was contrary to law, and the decision of the government. Provisions which had undergone any part of the process of curing in any country, were to be considered the production of that country, not of the country from which they happened to be directly imported.

In order that the meat should be admitted into this country as Canadian, it was necessary that every part of the process of curing should have taken place in Canada, and government had given strict instructions to that effect.

Charge of threatening to shoot the Queen and Sir Robert Peel.—It is again our painful duty to record the apprehension of another "monomaniac," in London, who has been apprehended on the charge of threatening the lives of the Queen and Sir Robert Peel. At his examination before the Lord Mayor on Friday, he gave his name James Stephenson, and said he belonged to the parish of Lachwinnoch, in Breckinshire. He said that he wished the woman to be put on one side—the woman was to be destroyed, and the man was to take the reins of the affairs of this nation. The Captain of the Steamer stated that the prisoner during the voyage told him that he had written to Sir R. Peel, and that he would finish both the Queen and Sir R. Peel. The prisoner in reply, said, "I never said I'd finish them; I don't think I did; but I said I'd strike at the root of the tree. I could catch a minister of the kingdom who would not do what he was bound to do. My attention was first drawn to the subject of Sir R. Peel being in power when the man shot the Queen. I wrote the letter to Sir R. Peel at that time. I read of his being in power at that time in the newspaper."

The result of the examination left no doubt that the mind of the prisoner was disordered, and he was committed by the Lord Mayor to Compter, in order that medical men might have the opportunity of examining him.

On Monday, at 3 o'clock, the above individual was removed from Newgate to Bethlem Hospital.

Earthquake at Liverpool.—During the night of Thursday the 10th, and Friday the 11th, there were experienced in this town and neighborhood two or more shocks, which, as there is no account yet received of the explosion by land or sea of any piece of ordnance, or of any mine, we cannot attribute to anything else but a movement of the earth beneath us, and as the thing is neither unprecedented nor improbable, there is no occasion for any obstinate incredulity. It was also felt in the neighborhood of Manchester, and extended to the Derbyshire hills.

IRELAND.

Dublin, March the 10th.—The repeal cause appears to be progressing rapidly. Peter Purcell at the late discussion in the corporation, declared that the people of Ireland were not for repeal, inasmuch as they were not freely subscribing their money; and this assertion having aroused the repealers of Ireland, the receipts at the Corn Exchange seem to have been more than doubled.

Agricultural.

From the Kentucky Farmer.

AN ESSAY ON THE CULTIVATION OF HEMP.

The first thing to be done by a person who is about to engage in the culture of hemp, is to rear seed for his future crop. This is not only important, as regards economy, but still more so for other reasons. There is no seed so easily injured, and rendered unfit for sowing, as that upon which we depend for producing a hemp crop.

It is said by some farmers that you cannot easily sow too much seed on the ground, as it will thin itself sufficiently, and only so much will grow as it will support; that by sowing an over quantity of seed, the danger of the hemp growing too coarse will be obtained. This is certainly true; but where a double quantity of seed is sown, that portion of the hemp which will not come to perfection, will take from the more thrifty plants a part of the nourishment which they would otherwise have received, up to the period when the underlying hemp perishes, and consequently will not attain as great a height as it would otherwise have done. Besides, that portion of the hemp which perishes, will be an obstruction in cutting, spreading and breaking, without furnishing any hint. It may, therefore, be laid down as a correct principle, in the culture of hemp, that only so much seed should be sown per acre as the soil will bring to perfection, or as near that quantity as practicable. But as it is impossible to distribute the seed so as to give to every foot of ground its due proportion, it is more safe to sow rather an over than an under quantity of seed.

The foregoing consideration, it is believed, will be sufficient to impress upon the cultivators of hemp, the importance of raising their own seed. They will thus have a perfect knowledge of its quality, and will therefore know how to regulate the quantity to be sown per acre. They will moreover be assured that it is free from other seeds, such as foxtail, &c.

The richest ground is the best adapted to raising of hemp seed; and that which has been highly manured is better than newly cleared land, even of the most fertile quality. Land which has been long in grass, and pastured by cattle or sheep, is very suitable for the purpose. To prepare ground for hemp seed, it should be ploughed the preceding fall, so that the ground may be not only more completely pulverized, but the danger of hemp being cut by worms may be avoided. Timothy meadow upon which sheep have been long pastured, during the winter, is finely adapted for hemp seed, but it should be ploughed in the fall, and if not very rich, should have a dressing of manure.

The seed should be planted as we do corn, either in hills or drills. I prefer the former, as the plough can be used both ways. It is usual to plant five feet apart each way, and suffer four or five stalks to stand in a hill until the blossom hemp is removed; and then reduce the number so as not to exceed two stalks in a hill. Thus there would be two seed plants for each twenty-five square feet. It would be a better practice to make the hills three feet apart each way and thin the hemp to three stalks in a hill, till the blossom hemp appears, and at the proper time cut out the blossom or male hemp, and if necessary a part of the seed hemp, so as to reduce the latter to one stalk in a hill. If each hill should contain just one stalk, there would be two seed stalks for each twenty-four and a half square feet. This will give a greater number of seed stalks per acre than planting five feet each way, and leaving two in a hill. According to this plan, each seed plant will stand by itself, and having its appropriate space of ground, can spread its branches without obstruction. According to the other plan, two seed plants, standing together, will obstruct each other in putting forth lateral branches, and can scarcely be expected to produce twice as much seed as the single stock.

The ground for hemp seed, having been well prepared by at least two ploughings, and a number of harrowings, sufficient to pulverize the ground, it should be laid off as above directed, and planted in the same manner as corn, except that the seed need not be covered more than an inch or an inch and a half deep. Twelve or fifteen seed should be dropped in each hill, which should be somewhat scattered, to prevent them from being too much crowded in the hill. Though good hemp seed is certain to come up, yet it is prudent to plant about the number suggested to guard against casualties. Soon after the hemp seed comes up, a small shovel plough should be run through both ways, once in a row. If the ground is not foul, the ploughing may be delayed till the hemp is a few inches high, which will enable the ploughman to avoid throwing the dirt on the tender plants. The hoes should follow the second ploughing, and clean away the weeds, if any, in or near the hill, and thin out the hemp to seven or eight stalks. These should be the most thrifty plants, and somewhat separated from each other. The ploughing should be repeated from time to time, so as to make the ground light and free from weeds. And when the plants are about a foot or a foot and a half high, the hoes should again go over the ground, and carefully cut down any weeds or grass which may have escaped the plough. The plants should be still further thinned out, at this time leaving but four in a hill, and some fine mould drawn around the plants, so as to cover any small weeds that may have come up around them. After seed hemp has attained the height of a foot and a half, it will soon be too large to plough, but it ought to have one ploughing after the last hoeing. The ground by this time will have become so much shaded by the hemp plants as to prevent the weeds from growing so as to do any injury, and nothing more need be done but for a boy to follow the plough, and (if three and a half feet be the distance of the hills apart,) reduce the number of plants invariably to three, taking care to remove those which the last ploughing may have broken or injured, by the treading of the horse or otherwise.

The next operation will be to cut out the blossom or male hemp. This, according to the opinion of some farmers, should be done as soon as the blossom begins to show in order to make more room for the seed hemp to grow and spread its branches. This opinion must be taken with some allowance. The farina or pollen of the male hemp is necessary to fertilize the seed bearing plants. The seed of the latter would be wholly unproductive if the whole of the male hemp should be cut before its pollen has been thrown out. If those farmers who cut their blossom hemp at the first moment it can be distinguished from the seed bearing plant, do not entirely destroy their seed, it is because many blossom plants escape, in consequence of their not having shown their sex at the time the blossom hemp is cut, or because adjacent hemp fields may have furnished a sufficient quantity of pollen to fertilize, at least in part, the seed bearing plants. It is important to cut the male hemp so soon as it has performed its office, because much room is thereby afforded to the seed bearing plants to spread their branches.

The following course might be pursued with advantage. When the seed hemp has so far advanced as to enable one readily to distinguish the male from the female plants, let all the blossom hemp be cut out, except one stalk in every other hill and every other row. This would leave one stalk of male hemp for every four hills. These, together with the stalks which should thereafter blossom, would be sufficient to fertilize all the seed bearing plants, and secure a crop of perfect seed. After the blossom plants, thus left, have been permitted to remain until they have pretty well discharged their pollen, (which can easily be ascertained by dust ceasing to flow from them when agitated,) they also should be cut down. Some farmers top the seed plants when five or six feet high, to make them branch more freely; but this is not necessary when but one or two seed bearing plants are suffered to remain in each hill.

Hemp seed should be planted early in the month of April. Early planting succeeds best. If the ground is in proper condition, it may be planted even as early as March. Hemp is a hardy plant, and will not, as supposed by some, be injured by frost. If planted early, it will be fit to cut from the first to the fifteenth of September, and there is no necessity to wait for frost. On the contrary, it is better to cut before it receives any frost, because the seed drop out by handling much easier after it has received a frost than before, and consequently will be a greater waste. In cutting the seed plants, care should be taken to agitate them as little as possible, as the seeds drop out very easily when they are ripe. A sharp hemp hook, of a circular form, is the best instrument for cutting seed hemp. The operator should grasp the stock in one hand, and bend it gently towards him, and with the other should place the blade of the hemp hook against the stalk about a foot from the ground, and by a gentle pull the stalk will be cut transversely, with but little agitation. The stalks should be laid gently on the ground, so as not to shatter out the seed, four hills in a heap. The operation should be performed in the morning, while the dew is on the hemp, as the seeds will then be less liable to shatter out. There are two modes of managing seed hemp after it is cut. One is to set the stalks up in open shocks, until they are sufficiently dry to thrash out the seed, and then haul them on a sled to a dirt floor, prepared for the purpose, and there thrash out the seed.

The other method is to prepare a large floor on the earth adjacent to the seed hemp, and by means of forks and poles arranged along the floor, to set up the seed plants in a kind of a rick, the butts on the ground, and the tops against the poles on each side.

The former plan is objectional, upon the ground that all the seed which shatters out before the time of threshing, will be lost; and also because of the impossibility of removing the seed hemp from the shocks to the sled without a considerable loss of seed. The latter plan requires more labor in preparing the floor, but is much more economical in saving seed, and should be preferred. A sled should be employed to transfer the seed hemp to the floor. If a sheet be spread on the sled, there will be scarcely any loss of seed in hauling as it can be driven so close to the floor as that all the seed that may shatter off in hauling will either fall on the sheet or on the floor. The seed hemp should be suffered to stand in rick till thoroughly dry. If it should receive some rain it will be an advantage as this will cause the seed to separate more readily from the chaff, and will facilitate the operation of threshing. If the season should be very wet, there may be danger of the seed sprouting in the rick. This must be guarded against, by opening the tops of the hemp (which will have been pressed together by the rain) so as to give it air and sun, as soon as the weather clears off. After much rain the seed may be threshed out, even when the tops are quite damp or even wet, and it should be got out without delay, to prevent the seed from sprouting. But, if got out when damp the chaff and hemp seed will become warm in a few hours after it is heaped up. To prevent its injuring, it should be run through a fan on the same day it is threshed, and taken to the barn or some dry shelter, where it should be spread out, and frequently raked or stirred until it becomes thoroughly dry, and cured, when it should be again run through the fan, and put away in barrels with open heads, in a house which is dry, and to which rats can have no access, as they are very destructive to hemp seed. A house erected upon posts, four feet high, is the best security against these troublesome animals. If the seed hemp get a rain after it is set up in rick, it may be threshed out in a week or ten days, or sooner if it begins to sprout. If it gets no rain, it may stand in rick. The most convenient mode of threshing is each hand to have a plank, about twelve or fifteen feet long, and fifteen or eighteen inches wide, set up against the pole, (at an angle of forty five degrees,) against which the seed hemp was ricked. The operator threshes out seed by taking one, two, or three plants at a time, (according to their size) in his hands, and beating them against the plank. As the seed comes out very easily, a few blows are sufficient to knock all the seed out, when the plants are thrown off the floor, in heaps, where they may be burnt, or may be used for covering shelters for hogs, cattle, &c. They are said to be valuable also for making charcoal for powder factories. They are of no value for lint.

It is the safest course, even when the seed hemp is perfectly dry at the time of threshing, to haul the seed, after it has been once run through the fan, to the barn or some dry shelter, and there spread it out thin, and suffer it to become thoroughly cured before it is cleaned and put away. This will be a great security against its heating in the barrels, which would be certain to spoil the seed. If, however, the seed hemp has stood long enough in rick, for the seed to become perfectly cured, the trouble of hauling it to the barn may be dispensed with, and it may be run a second time through the fan at the place where it is threshed. But to avoid getting dirt with the seed, it should be run upon a sheet, at the second cleaning, and measured there into bags.

Old seed will generally not answer for sowing. During the summer, succeeding the year in which it was reared, it goes through a heat, which destroys its vegetable powers. If, however, it were to be spread out thin, on a dry floor, before the commencement of warm weather, and kept thus spread out during the summer, there can be no doubt it would answer for sowing the ensuing year. But it is always safest not to trust to old seed without having first tested it by planting a certain number of seeds, and thus ascertaining how many will vegetate.

The floor for getting out seed should be prepared before the time for cutting arrives. It should be as convenient as practicable to save hauling. I usually leave a space along side of my seed hemp for the purpose. This may be planted in pumpkins, and cultivated with the plough. Shortly before the seed hemp is fit to cut, the pumpkins and vines are removed, the ground is well harrowed, and then trod by horses, until it becomes sufficiently solid, and then scraped with hoes, to make it smooth, swept, &c.

The next step in the process of hemp raising is to prepare the ground for receiving the seed. This should be done by thoroughly pulverizing the soil. Hemp, more than most other crops, requires that this should be done in as complete and perfect a manner as possible. The hemp grower may always expect his crop to be increased in proportion as his operations are well performed. This can be best accomplished by ploughing the ground intended for hemp the preceding fall, or early in the winter, so that it may have the benefit of the winter frosts. It should be ploughed deep, and left in a rough state, without harrowing. Not a hoof should be suffered to go upon it. Shortly after sowing, it should again be ploughed and harrowed. The latter is necessary to level the ground, in order to prevent the seed from rolling into the sinuosities, and thus render the hemp uneven. It should now be sowed and harrowed both ways, or harrowed one way and then rolled or brushed the other way. This is preferable, as it will lay the surface of the ground more level, and will facilitate the cutting operation, enabling the workman to cut closer to the ground, and thus save lint. This is the most advisable course for early sowing, when there is always sufficient quantity of moisture in the ground to bring the seed up. But if there is any doubt about there being sufficient moisture in the ground to cause all the seed to vegetate, it is more safe to plough the seed with shovel ploughs. These will cover the seed to such a depth as will insure their coming up, unless the ground should be very dry. In that case there is no alternative but to wait for rain before you sow. Different opinions prevail as to the proper quantity of seed to be sown per acre. My experience, which has been considerable, convinces me that the quantity of good seed upon well prepared ground, and sown when there is moisture enough to bring all up, need not exceed one bushel and one eighth per acre; but as the most skillful sower cannot scatter the seed so as to give every proportion of ground its due proportion, it would be advisable to sow a bushel and a peck per acre.

Manured ground does not answer so well for hemp, the first year, as that which has been lying long in grass. It recently and highly manured, it is apt to make the hemp grow too coarse. Land which has been several years in clover, (if it had not been previously too much reduced by bad husbandry) is well adapted to hemp; but it is sometimes seriously affected by the cut worm and other insects. To guard against these, clover should always be ploughed in the previous fall or early in the winter. A still greater safeguard is to sow clover ground late in the month of May.

Hemp may be sowed upon the same ground many years in succession to great advantage; and as, after the first year, the cut worm is usually not very troublesome, there will be a necessity of taking the precaution of sowing late only one year.

Land which has long lain in blue grass, especially if pastured by sheep, is finely adapted to the growth of hemp. But to make it produce well the first year, it is essential that the sod should be well turned over the preceding fall, so that it may have time to decompose, and become strongly pulverized.

Newly cleared land is not so good for hemp as that which has been in cultivation a year or two in corn. But if sowed after corn, the stalks should be cut close to the ground the previous fall, and the roots of the corn turned under with a large plough, so that they may have time to rot. They will be somewhat in the way in cutting hemp the first year, but will be no trouble afterwards.

It is very important for the hemp grower, to have his ground set apart in which nothing else grows. These may be kept for hemp a great length of time without any change, and consequently there will be no necessity for suffering any kind of stock to go upon the hemp ground. The soil will thus be kept light and mellow. As soon as the hemp, of the previous crop, is off the ground, it should be ploughed deep, turning all the hemp stubble and roots under. If this can be done in time to have the benefit of the spring frosts, so much the better. It should not be harrowed (if ploughed early enough to have the benefit of the spring frosts) till the time of sowing. With one harrowing before, and two after, the crop will be pitched. If, in consequence of heavy rains, the ground should have become baked, it would be advisable to plough the seed in with shovel ploughs, so as to render the ground light. And in all cases where there is a doubt whether there is a sufficient quantity of moisture in the ground to bring the seed up by harrowing, the shovel plough should be substituted, as it will cover the seed much deeper where it will find moisture to make it vegetate. If harrowed in when the ground is very dry, that which is covered to some depth will sprout and come up, but that portion of the seed which lies near the surface will not vegetate till it rains. If there be only one week between the coming up of the first and last portion of the seed, the latter will be so far behind the other as to be always what is called underling hemp, and will be of no value, whilst that which came up first will be too thin, and will consequently grow very coarse. This should be most carefully guarded against.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEIGHBOR. THE NATURE OF MALT BEER, AND ITS EFFECTS WHEN USED AS A BEVERAGE.

In making a few remarks on this subject, I expect to come in contact with the settled opinion of those who have not either studied its nature or witnessed its effects to any great extent, but who have been taught to believe it to be a wholesome and nutritious drink, and calculated to strengthen and invigorate the human system. I would, therefore, invite such to study the nature of the drinking system, and they will soon be able to discover that all alcoholic drinks are injurious in their nature, and calculated to impregnate the human system with a multiplicity of disorders. It mattereth not whether it be gin, rum, brandy, whiskey or malt beer; they all possess the same intoxicating quality, (viz: alcohol,) and are all calculated to produce the same enervating effects. Malt beer, as is well known, is a fermented liquor, the principal ingredients in making of which are malt and hops. Malt is made from barley. Barley is used in the north of England and Scotland as food, and is a useful and nutritious grain, which may be seen from the following statement:

350 parts out of every 1,000 in potatoes are real nutriment.

Thus barley is more valuable than oats as food, and nearly 3 3/4 as valuable as potatoes for the same purposes. The query, therefore, might arise in the minds of some, is not malt beer a cheap and nutritious beverage? In order to set this matter to rest, and satisfy the minds of those who have hitherto fostered such an opinion, I will extract the following from the Temperance Advocate. "By pointing out the difference between buying barley, which is the only nutritious ingredient in malt beer, and buying beer, it will be most manifest that malt beer, independent of its consequences, is exceedingly dear, and I will prove it by supposing two characters, a beer drinker and a water drinker. These two characters we will send to the same market, each of them shall have 50 cents to start with, and on the result of their errand I confidently depend for proof that beer is not a cheap beverage. The beer drinker and the water drinker both go to the same shop, and both procure the same article, viz: 30 lbs. of barley. Thus far they are equal, but now they part; the water drinker proffers his 30 lbs. in its original state, and he therefore hurries home with it. But not so with the beer drinker. He must have his 30 lbs. converted into beer, and he therefore hurries to his friend, the malster, and afterwards to his other friends, for the beer drinker has many misnamed friends, and having required their services, he is determined to be honest, and give each of them a share of his 30 lbs. of barley, he consequently distributes it as follows, viz:

To the malster, 1 1/2
To the brewer, 10
To the retailer, 7 1/2 ————— 19

And thus he leaves for himself 11 lbs. out of 30. If given in money, it would stand as follows:

malster, 2 1/2
brewer, 13 retailer, 12
————— 30 1/2

Thus you see that 30 1/2 cts. out of his 50 is gone to his different friends, in the shape of profits, and now he has only 19 1/2 cts., or nineteen and a half cents worth of barley left out of 30 lbs. or 50 cts. worth.

From the above statement you will perceive that, provided all the barley remaining was actually in the beer, there could not be more than 19 cents worth, or 11 lbs. of barley in the beer drinkers 50 cts. worth, or one gallon of beer. Now I say instead of 19 cents worth, there is not more than 2 cents worth of the nutritious part of barley in the beer drinkers 50 cents worth. And now for the test. After our worthy beer drinker has given his friends their share of his 30 lbs. of barley, he has 11 lbs. left; this he must have converted into malt, and his friend the malster, being paid for his trouble, gladly does him this kindness; but in the process, the heads and tails of the grain must be cut off, and his friend, the malster, thus reduces the weight and strength of the barley one fourth. He has now only 8 1/4 lbs. left. With this he goes to the brewer, who obliges him by converting his malted barley into beer; but the brewer knowing that the beer drinker likes his beer as clear as possible, endeavors to serve him in this respect by keeping back nearly all the solid, substantial and nutritious part of the grain, and so well does he succeed that in the beer drinkers 50 cents worth of gallon of beer, there is not more than 12 ounces of anything like a solid or a nutritious substance remaining.

The difference betwixt 8 1/4 lbs. and 12 ounces is disposed of first, in the shape of grains to the cows and hogs, and secondly condly, in the shape of barrel bottoms. The saccharine or sweet substance extracted from the malt is, by fermentation, converted into spirit; so that the gallon of beer contains near 3 1-2 quarts of water, 7 ounces of spirit, and 12 ounces of the coarsest parts of the barley. This 12 ounces is not more nutritious than bread, and as it is well known that this amount of bread can be produced for 2 cents, it follows of course that in a gallon of beer there is not more than two cents worth of food.

Is malt beer a nutritious beverage? No. Beer, as I have said, is made from malt and hops. Hops is a narcotic, but possesses no nutrition. Malt is made from barley, the elementary substances of which it is composed, are gum, sugar, gluten and starch. These elementary substances are exceedingly nutritious, and would, either separate or together, support life.

In barley the proportion is—gum, sugar, gluten, starch,
5 4 3 83
In malt the proportion is—gum, sugar, gluten, starch,

Thus you see that in malting, 19 parts of starch and 2 of gluten are changed into 12 of sugar and 9 of gum. Now gum and sugar, though nutritious, are not so nutritious as gluten and starch—so already has the substance been deteriorated with respect to its nutrition. The sole object of malting is an artificial germination of the grain, and by that means to quicken the sugar or saccharine matter, and no sooner have they done this than the grain is again dried, and thus the sugar or saccharine matter secured. Malt is, therefore, as you must perceive, a less nutritious substance than barley, but yet it is nutritious, and might be used as food without injury. It has afterwards to be brewed, in which process nearly all the nutriment is rejected from the liquor or converted into spirit. The grain is not boiled, for if it was the gum, gluten, and the starch, as well as the sugar, would be extracted, and thus the object of the brewer would be frustrated. The grain therefore is merely scalded by water of a sufficient heat to dissolve, and thus detach the sugar or saccharine matter from the rest of the grain; and this being done, it is drawn off as gently as possible and placed in tubs to cool; it is then what is called wort, has an exceedingly sweet taste, (a full proof that the sugar or saccharine matter has been secured), and might be drunk in any quantity without intoxication. But there is yet another change.

Malt not content with having deteriorated the quality of the grain in the malting process—not content with having rejected in the brewing, the principle part of the gum, the gluten, and the starch, (which compose 84 of the 100 parts of nutrition) he is further determined to change the sugary nutrition which remains, into alcohol or spirit. The wort is taken and put into barrels where it is fermented, and in this process the wort is changed into a nauseous, unpalatable drink; the sweetness in the wort has become spirit or alcohol, and we have now a liquor termed malt beer, composed of spirit, water, and a small portion of glutinous, slightly nutritious matter. In one gallon of beer at a moderate strength, the proportions are, 7 oz of pure spirit or alcohol, 12 oz of a coarse substance, slightly nutritious, and nearly 3 1-2 quarts of water.

Who after this can say that beer is a nutritious beverage? Water is a suitable digestive, but the 12 oz of coarse nutriment is more than counterbalanced by the evil contained in the 7 oz of spirit or alcoholic poison.

As the above extract clearly demonstrates beyond all powers of contradiction, that malt is neither cheap nor nutritious, I shall in conclusion offer a few remarks on its physical and moral influence upon society.

Dr. Brodie found that by the administration of a dose of alcohol to a rabbit, the pupils of its eyes became dilated, its extremities convulsed, and the respiration laborious, and that this latter function was gradually performed at longer and longer intervals, and that at length it entirely ceased. Two minutes after the apparent death of the animal, he opened the thorax (chest) and found the heart acting with moderate force and frequency, circulating dark colored blood. The same phenomena resulted from the injection of two drops of the essence of bitter almonds, (whose active principle is prussic acid,) diffused in half an ounce of water into the bowels of a cat.

Here we have irrefragable proof that spirit is a poison of the very nature as prussic acid, producing the same effects, killing by the same means, paralyzing the muscles of respiration, and so preventing the necessary change of black into vermilion blood.

With regard to the influence of intoxicating drinks over the morals of its votaries is a subject too well understood to need much comment. But as malt beer is considered by some to be partially harmless in its effect. I would here remark, that wherever and whenever it has been used as a beverage, its influence over the morals of the people have been of the most alarming nature, producing wars, contentions, strife and malice on every hand, paralyzing the tender feeling of the parent, bracing the nerves of the midnight ruffian, while committing deeds the most revolting to human nature. I have known many individuals who in the early stage of life have been temperate, sober and industrious; honest in all their dealings, and circumspect in their general deportment, they having been taught to believe that malt beer was really nutritious, and calculated to strengthen and invigorate the human system; indulge in partaking of a little for that purpose. From this little, they grew to more, until at length they became confirmed drunkards; the property which they had previously accumulated began to decline, their reputations depreciated, and ultimately they have sunk into a premature grave, and their children left destitute and forlorn. Thousands under the influence of this intoxicating drink, have violated the laws of their country for which they have been banished from their native country, or had to linger out a miserable existence in a penitentiary, or expire on the gallows. Therefore, as malt beer is one of the producing causes of intemperance and profligacy with every thing that is vicious and immoral, it ought to be looked upon with abhorrence by every individual who has a desire for the welfare of society.

If the inhabitants of Nauvoo are in need of a cheap and nutritious beverage, let them manufacture a mild and unfermented drink from barley. By so doing they will prevent intemperance, and secure sobriety; instead of broken and convulsed frames and broken constitutions, they will have health to their navel and marrow to their bones; the pleasures of domestic comfort will be secured, and temperance and sobriety will dwell among us.

We do not profess to be sufficiently acquainted with the nature and properties of malt, or malt beer; nor with its chemical analyses to decide whether the above statement is correct or not; but we are informed that some of our citizens are putting up a brewery; if they think that they can defend themselves against this philosophical disquisition they can have the privilege.

THE NEIGHBOR.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 17, 53.

TEMP.

As the cultivation of hemp is a subject in which our agricultural interests are deeply involved, we have this week given very copious extracts from an elaborate and well written article on the subject, for the purpose of laying it before our readers in all its details.

Perhaps there is no branch of agriculture wherein capital could be better invested, and labor more profitably laid out, than in that of the cultivation of hemp. It certainly requires more labor to prepare it for market than many other crops, but when it is prepared, it not only pays better, but brings the cash. The Messrs. Laws, who it is well known have paid considerable attention to it during the past season, inform us that the profits arising from it, when all expenses are paid, will be four times that of wheat.

IMPORTANT TO WEAVERS.

The Messrs. Laws have on hand a great quantity of hemp, from which Table cloths, Russia Duck, Sacking, various fabrics for summer wear could be manufactured. We wish to invite the attention of our spinners and weavers to this thing. If we can manufacture our own goods, we should not only find employment for ourselves, but keep our money at home, a thing which is greatly to be desired in these times. We are persuaded that all the goods of the description that is manufactured from hemp could be manufactured in Nauvoo. We have weavers and spinners that are acquainted with every department of the business, and that could follow it in this place to good advantage.

If a few hatchels, weavers, spinners, dyers, &c., could form an association and manufacture all such fabrics as can be made from hemp, we think that they would do good, both to themselves and to the community.

If those interested will communicate with us, we shall take pleasure in putting them in the way of accomplishing this object.

[From the State Register] IMPAIRING THE OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS.

We lay before our readers the following letter from his excellency G. W. Ford addressed to Messrs. Oakley and Ryan, upon the occasion of their leaving the State in order to procure subscriptions for completing the Illinois and Michigan canal. This able document puts forever to flight the false and scandalous imputations cast upon the Democracy of this State by the New York Tribune, and more recently by the Singapore Journal, the organ of Federalism in our own State. The arch fiend himself, in the fallacy of his policy, fraud and falsehood, never conceived or invented a more gross and infamous fabrication, than the charge which the Tribune originated and the Journal endorsed. In our last, we gave our readers an insight into the motives of the Junta who control the Journal. They fear that means to go on with the canal will be of aid; and that the Democracy of the State with our enterprising Governor at the head, will have the credit of completing that noble work. Such a result, although it would raise the prostrate energies of our State and restore prosperity to our people, the Federal party are unwilling to see accomplished under Democratic rule; and hence their efforts to deceive, flatter bondholders and capitalists into the belief, that the next Legislature will repeal the law under which they may advance their capital and expend it within our State—a doctrine for which no man in Illinois of any party ever contended. In proof of this, we are the motives of the Junta here, we would remind our northern readers of the efforts of the Federal party in the Legislature of 1840 to defeat the canal in order to drive the "dam'd Irish" out of the State, and thus prevent their voting against Duncan, whom they had already agreed upon as their candidate for Governor.

Gov. Ford, in his letter makes the whole subject so plain that no rational man can misunderstand it. His letter cannot fail to add to his reputation, and make the Democracy feel more than ever proud of the man whom they advanced to the highest office within their gift.

Executive Department,
Springfield March 7th, 1842

To Col. Charles Oakley and the Hon. Michael Ryan. Agents to receive subscriptions for completing the Illinois and Michigan canal.

GENTLEMEN: I have seen with regret that some enemy of the State of Illinois, (probably resident among us,) is endeavoring, by publications in the Atlantic newspapers, to make the impression, that the Legislature and public authorities of this State, are not to be trusted for a further advance of money for the Illinois & Michigan canal, although the State tenders as a pledge that which all admit to be an ample security.

The late canal law grants the canal, the canal lands, and some thousands of town and city lots, the water power, and all the appurtenances of the canal, to trustees for the security of such subscribers, as will advance the further sum of one million six hundred thousand dollars, for the completion of the canal; and ultimately for the payment of the whole canal debt heretofore contracted. But it is pretended by the writers before alluded to, that the dominant party in this State in whose hands the political power now is, and where it will most probably continue, profess to believe, and do believe, in the right of the Legislature, at a subsequent session, to repeal at will all such contracts and solemn engagements as may have been entered into and entered into at the present session. That consequently the subscribers to such a loan, would be endangered in their security by wayward and fickle legislation in future. There can be no imputation more unjust than this; and there is scarcely a colorable ground for putting it forth. No citizen of this State with whose opinions I am acquainted believes in any such doctrine; nor does any one within the compass of my knowledge believe that where capitalists are invited by an act of the Legislature to expend their money here, in making internal improvements, and where they actually do make such an expenditure upon an express pledge of property, that such an act can be repealed; or that there is any power known to the Constitution capable of resuming the grant, or annihilating the pledge.

These writers for proof of their assertion, produce the acts repealing the charters of the Bank of Illinois and Cairo; which at first view and without explanation would seem to sanction this imputation upon the late session of the General Assembly. But when the matter is properly understood, it will be clearly perceived that there is no ground for the horrible aspersion, which the friends of those rotten and swindling banks, have endeavored to fasten upon the authorities of this State; merely for the purpose of revenge upon the friends of the canal who voted for those acts of repeal; and the accomplishment of ulterior political objects.

And now I propose to give you this explanation in an authoritative and authentic form, so that in a distant country, where proof of the falsity of this slander may not be easily obtained, you may not be embarrassed by it in your negotiations.

The truth then is, that both of those banks were created by the Legislature of the Illinois Territory, the first on the 28th day of December, 1816, and the other on the 9th day of January, 1818.

In the month of August, 1818, the Territorial Government was abolished by the adoption of a State Constitution and the subsequent admission of Illinois into the Federal Union, upon an equal footing with the original States. The Constitution then adopted and still in force, contains the following provision: "There shall be no other banks or monied institutions in this State, but those already provided by law, except a State Bank and its branches, which may be established and regulated by the General Assembly of the State, as they may think proper." The Banks of Illinois and Cairo came under the description contained in this article as "being already provided by law" and the charter of the Bank of Illinois would have expired, by its own limitation, on the first day of January 1847, if the General Assembly of the State had not, on the 12th day of February 1835, renewed and lengthened it out.

There have always been many intelligent persons of both political parties who conscientiously believed that under the Constitution quoted above, the General Assembly had no power to extend that charter. They believed it to have been the intention of the framers of the Constitution, to have but one bank and its branches in the State; and that the provision in favor of such banks as had been "already provided by law," was inserted merely by way of protection to existing charters; intending that those banks should forfeit no right acquired by Territorial Legislation, but at all events cease to exist with the law creating them, and give place to the sole dominion of a State Bank, thereafter in the power of the Legislature to establish. And it was in virtue of this belief that a large number of the members of the General Assembly at the session, voted for a repeal of the law extending the charter of the Bank of Illinois.

It is also a fact, that the bank of Illinois continued to do business, under its territorial charter until about the year 1821—at which time it ceased business; and never had any kind of organization whatever until the year 1835. Thus a space of time had intervened of about fourteen years during which time it was to all intents and purposes defunct in point of fact; and this hiatus in its operation was regarded by many as an effective cessation of its existence; leaving nothing to renew or continue by the act of 1835. Others objected to it, because it had been notoriously insolvent, in the usual acceptance of the term, for most of the time since the year 1837; having been nearly all that time in a state of suspension of specie payments, and as most of the members of the General Assembly were of the opinion, in open breach of its charter. By means of which the people of this state complain of immense loss and injury, from the great expansion of its circulation and the consequent depreciation of its notes in their hands. This has been the condition, not only of the bank of Illinois, but of the State Bank, and the bank of Cairo; and this condition of things has been borne by the people of this state, until endurance ceased to be virtue; they consequently were bound, not only by the laws of self preservation and good neighborhood to the people of the adjacent states and territories, who suffer equally with themselves, to drive those banks into an honest and faithful discharge of their duties; or to abate altogether the nuisances, by which they had hitherto been annoyed. The State Bank was brought to a sense of its duty, and under a law passed at the late session has gone into voluntary liquidation. The Bank of Illinois, for a time, openly declared its intention to set the power of the Legislature at defiance; and to continue the nefarious system of banking in which it had been engaged for many years past.

The Bank of Cairo never accepted of its territorial charter, nor was any stock ever subscribed, or any kind of organization attempted until about the year 1837. Thus a period of nineteen years had elapsed without any visible sign of its existence, when it suddenly came into being as a new creature, under pretence of an old charter, the memory of which had come down to but few of the present generation; and which, many intelligent persons believed, was entirely defunct, by reason of long and continued nonuser.—This latter bank also, as I am informed, and as it was generally believed by the General Assembly, never paid specie for its liabilities at any time. It went into operation under a general suspension of specie payments and availed itself of the general delinquency of banks, in this respect, to put itself upon an equality, as to credit, with the best of them; and by this means obtained such a circulation for its paper, and so expanded its discounts, that it could never have hoped to have redeemed its notes with gold and silver coin.

It was understood also, that the bank of Cairo had abandoned whatever of a pretended charter it had, heretofore laid claim to, by an assignment of all its effects and a voluntary resignation of all its directors and officers without any elections to fill the vacancies thereby occasioned. The law of repeal, therefore, could not have been an act of violence to property, and could only have been intended to prevent any future resurrection of this swindling concern.

Under these circumstances, the Legislature believed that if these banks ever had any legal and constitutional existence, the law of their being had been so repeatedly and constantly violated by them, that the State as one of the contracting parties was no longer bound by the contract implied in their charters. They believed it to be fully competent for the Legislature to repeal a charter when it had been repeatedly and notoriously violated by the corporators; when it had altogether ceased to answer the purposes for which it was enacted; and when its very existence was a nuisance to all the country round, within and without the State.

You will therefore not fail to perceive that the repeal of these charters do not at all demonstrate that the dominant party in this state are so reckless and desperate and so little regardless of private rights that they would wantonly and willfully repeal even the charter of a bank if it should appear that a legal and constitutional charter existed; or unless the corporation had itself, first openly and notoriously set the law of its being at defiance; and this power, I believe, is not only claimed but exercised by most of the states of the Union. And these repealing laws do not at all prove that the Legislature claim to repeal a legislative grant of land, when money has been advanced on the faith of it, in works of internal improvements. I think I may venture safely to affirm that there is not any one man in the state of Illinois, either in or out of the Legislature, who believes or contends that a Legislative grant of lands or any interest in real estate consumed by an advance or expenditure of money, can be repealed or nullified by any power on earth.

But further to show conclusively, that the Legislature of this state do not hold to or act upon principles tending to the destruction of private rights; and the invasion of private property; but only intend as a matter of policy to exercise the power-compelling corporations as well as individuals to so use their property as not to annoy their neighbors, I have furnished you with true copies of all the laws enacted at the late session on the subject of banks; by which you will perceive, that although the General Assembly greatly desired to get rid of our rotten and rotten banking system, yet in accomplishing that desirable object you cannot fail to discover abundant evidence of a tender solicitude for private rights, in the mode adapted for winding them up. You will also perceive that the law repealing the charter of the bank of Illinois is accompanied by another which enables it, on favorable terms for creditors, stock holders and all interested, to go into voluntary liquidation, under the direction of its own officers.

It may be asked with reason, of what valuable property have those banks been deprived? Can it be contended that a franchise for banking is valuable property when the bank itself is insolvent, and by the very fact of hopeless insolvency, it is unable to exercise any of its functions without fraud upon the whole community. All of which I hereby certify to be true, under my hand and the (L.S) great seal of State the day and year first herein above written.

THOMAS FORD.

We should be pleased if as good an arrangement could be advanced for the proceedings of the House of Representatives, in their attempts to take away the charter of the city of Nauvoo, as the one advanced by the Governor in relation to the taking away the charters of the banks above referred to; then should we be forced to admit, that which we cannot now believe, that that honorable House acted legally, impartially, and disinterestedly.

The Governor here in his communication does point blank, and positively disclaim any belief in the right of the Legislature, at a subsequent session, to repeal at will all such contracts and solemn engagements, as may have been entered into and entered into at a previous session; an opinion which it will be recollected that we sustained, at a time when our charters were being canvassed by the legislative assembly. We were well aware at the time, that such a course of conduct would sap the foundation of our government, weaken our power at home, and our influence abroad, do away with all faith in our legislative enactments, and wound our State in its very vitals. This we at that time were free to declare—this we believe is the opinion of many in this State and throughout the Union; and if our legislators pursue the same wanton anti-republican, puerile course, and persist in passing laws, which break up solemn contracts destroy charters which previous legislators said should be granted "with a perpetual succession," interfere with the rights of private companies, they must necessarily destroy public confidence, and the reaction of their own deeds will roll like a mighty avalanche on their own devoted heads, overthrow the State in confusion, completely by the ruin that has already commenced the imbecile acts of some of our former legislators, and sink one of the noblest States in the Union, in everlasting poverty, odium, and disgrace.

True, in relation to the bank charters the Governor reasons very plausibly.—The bank of Cairo having assigned all its effects, resigned all its directors, and officers and virtually abandoned its charter could not complain, and the corruption of the other banks, the frequent violation of their charters, their utter inability to meet their contracts, and the fraudulent system of banking in which they had been engaged for years past, might indeed render a plausible excuse for the course pursued by the legislature. But what shall we say concerning the Charter of Nauvoo? What if the public had been generally informed on this subject, would have been their feelings concerning the act of our representatives? Or what if these gentlemen referred to, instead of bringing forth the circumstances of these banks to support their arguments, had referred to the repealing enactments of our House of Representatives in relation to the repeal of the Nauvoo Charters, in defiance of an act passed by a previous legislature granting them to us in "perpetual succession," without a repealing clause; what, we ask, would have been his answer? Why they could have sustained their arguments, and carried their point in defiance of negotiators, representatives, senators, governor or any other power or influence in the state, and these negotiators might have gone abroad with this odium resting on their heads. The old adage would surely be applicable here, "what is sauce for the goose, is sauce for the gander." We again ask, what argument could have been used to rebut an argument of that kind? Could it be said as of these banks? They had given up, or violated their charter, this was not pretended. Could it be argued that we had violated the law, or transgressed our chartered rights? This was not laid to our charge. Could it be said that we had become disorganized, corruptly departed from the law, or winked at crime? No! What then?

The only thing we know of is, that Francis said, that Davis believed, that Duncan stated that somebody had informed him, that John C. Bennett or some old woman had thought that they had been informed that it was quite possible that the Mormons might do something wrong, and our legislators, having such strong testimony of their wickedness and corruption, fearing that the Mormons might turn over the world, passed their act accordingly.

STEAM FERRY AT NAUVOO.

The enterprising proprietors of the ferry across the Mississippi, within the bounds of Nauvoo, have recently put a light steam-boat on operation for the accommodation of the public. Such a mode of conveyance, has been long needed, and we sincerely hope the community will zealously sustain it. At all times, hereafter, save when the river is ice-bound, a safe and speedy passage across the river, will be among the other improvements which result from the increasing vigilance, laudable ambition, and industry of the Latter Day Saints. Emigrants from abroad, moving into the Territory of Iowa, will find it a good place to cross the river at this season on account of its being safe as to wind and water; and the public generally may find the accommodation such as ought to be patronized, as well as those of older times. We say to an intelligent people as the prophet said to Israel: "Consider your ways."

DEATH BY DROWNING.

—On Sunday morning last, as two young men of the names Samuel Kirtles and Edmund Brazier, about eighteen years of age each, were sailing up the river in a small boat the wind blowing very high, they were suddenly swamped near the Steamboat Hotel, and we are sorry to add that the latter perished and his body has not yet been found. The ferry boat happened to be on the Nauvoo side, and Captain Jones and one of his hands instantly took a small boat and pushed off to their assistance, and after the most praiseworthy exertions succeeded in rescuing Kirtles from a watery grave, but could not see the slightest trace of the deceased after he went down, which was almost immediately after the boat swamped. We hope that this will be a caution to parents not to allow children on the river in small boats; and as a regular ferry boat is now established, we trust that any one taking passengers over in these boats, will be dealt with according to law; and thus prevent a number of accidents. The inhabitants will see the necessity of encouraging one regular ferry boat.

SURGICAL OPERATION.

—We learn that an exceedingly delicate operation was performed at the hospital in this city on Wednesday last, by Dr. P. V. Ellsworth, a surgeon of Hartford. The subject was a girl eleven years of age, of Humphreysville, who was horribly deformed from a burn which she received when three years of age. The scar covered the whole of one side of the neck, extending from the left ear to the middle of the chin, and again from the anterior to the posterior end of the collar bone. By the contraction of the skin the lower lip was completely turned out nearly to the bottom of the chin, and the jaw was drawn down to the breast so that the position of the lower teeth was horizontal. Dr. E. divided the scar and brought the jaw and lip up to their proper position; but this left a large gaping wound, which was necessary to fill, and this was done by cutting a strip of skin large enough to answer the purpose from the shoulder; this strip, several inches in length and breadth, was not entirely detached, but was connected at one end where it was twisted and then laid over the wound, the fleshy substance of course down and the wound was then bound up.

The wound on the shoulder was carefully drawn together, and the patient is doing well. She bore the tedious and painful dissection with great fortitude.—This entire operation we learn was never performed in Europe and never before in New England. It is not unusual to release such contractions of the skin by the knife, but Dr. Muter, of Philadelphia, first attempted to cover the wound from the adjoining skin. It has been tried five or six times in the country since with success, and it is believed that the first case in New England will result satisfactorily. Dr. Ellsworth has been very successful in other delicate operations, and takes a high rank in his profession.—N. H. Palladium.

Good advice is thus given by the Louisville Pennant: "Cease your grumbling about dull times; bring in your advertisements, and if you then have a chance to complain of business being dull, grumble as much as you please; but until the proper means of notifying your customers of what you have to dispose of, have been resorted to, never expect any improvement in your business."

Come hither says John, my pleasure is here. What say you, my love, do not it drive you? I can't say it does, just at present my dear, but think it will soon, its as like you.

MILLERISM.—The wags are making merry at Millerism. Since the appearance of the "Midnight Cry," one editor announces that he has in addition received a copy of the "Noonday Howl," and the "Morning Yell," and a paper has just made its appearance in this city called the "Vial of Wrath and Junk Bottle of Destruction." It contains a large number of plates, and amongst others, the description of the Beast of Daniel, with seven heads and ten horns, together with a chronological calculation as reasonable as Miller's, and quite as fanciful. It is as follows: The Beast had seven heads, and ten horns on each head, which makes seventy horns, answering to the seventy weeks of Daniel. Now the tail of this Beast was 606 feet long, which is the number of the Beast. Multiply this by seven, and it makes 4242, which was the age of the world when the first Christian Pope began to reign. Now tie up the Beast's tail into three knots, and it will shorten it to 614 feet 4 inches; which, being multiplied by three, the number of knots, gives 1843 exactly—the year in which the world will be burnt up. But there is another remarkable coincidence: Martin Luther wore boots with nails in the soles; just 263 nails in both boots, which being multiplied by the seven heads, gives 1841. Throw in two boots, which correspond to Miller and Himes, and it gives 1843.

Apt Reply.—An honest son of Erin green from his peregrinations, put his head into a lawyer's office and asked the innkeeper, "and what do you sell here?" "Blockheads," replied the innkeeper. "Och! then to be sure," said Pat, "it must be a good trade; for I see that there's only one left."

Why are the printer's bulls like faith?
Because they are the substance of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not seen.

LOVE AND VIRTUE.

BY MRS. SOPHIA J. STILES.

Och! what is love! affection pure;
Nothing can ever its progress stay;
Thro' every trial 'twill endure—
Grow brighter, like the perfect day.

'Tis love that makes our pathway sweet,
And soothes and calms our keenest woe;
It will the proudest heart defeat,
And bring the haughty monarch low.

'Twill not forsake when fortune flies,
Or weakness does the world's one spoil;
Of all that can attract the eye,
Of those who do on beauty smile.

'Tis not to beauty's fading flower;
That love, pure love, is prone to kneel;
But virtue, unadorn'd, has power
To cause the proudest heart to feel.

Yes, virtue with her simplest darts,
Has many a noble conquest won—
Subdued and conquer'd many a heart;
All this, nay more, has virtue done.

'Tis cloth'd with sweet humility;
A noble and a generous mind;
Make a proud ship upon the sea,
'Twill leave the follow'rs all behind.

And were it not for love's sweet balm,
The spring of every social joy,
This world would be a dead, dead calm—
An aching void, an empty toy.

From the New York Herald.
BRITISH HOLDERS OF AMERICAN STOCK.

The following is a reply which Mr. Everett made to a deputation which waited on him with the memorial of the holders of American stocks in this country. The reply does credit to the head and the heart of the American Minister, at the Court of St. James; it is justly admired. The memorial bore the signatures of 1000 holders of the state stocks of America:—

"Mr. Scholfield and Gentlemen.—In compliance with the request contained in the memorial which you have now presented to me, I will avail myself of the first opportunity of transmitting it to the President of the United States. To avoid misconception, it is proper that I should observe, that, inasmuch as the general government is not a party to the contracts of the separate states, the subject of the memorial does not fall directly within the President's province, and that I am myself acting unofficially in forwarding it to him. I do it, however, with cheerfulness, out of respect to the members of this distinguished deputation. Nor am I less under the influence of the deepest sympathy with that numerous class whom you represent, who have suffered severely, some of them I fear ruinously, from the failure (temporary, I trust) of a portion of the American states to pay the interest of their public debt. These feelings, I am sure, will be shared by the President.

"I concur with you in protesting against the doctrine that a state, which has pledged its faith and resources, can release itself from the obligation, however burdensome, in any way but that of honorable payment. Fatal delusions, in times of great distress, occasionally come over the minds of communities as well as individuals; but I rejoice in the belief that the number is exceedingly small of those who have, in any form, advanced the idea of what is called 'repudiation.' I am convinced that those states, which unhappily have failed to make provision for the interest due on their bonds, have done so under the heavy pressure of adverse circumstances, and not with the purpose of giving legislative sanction to a doctrine so pernicious, unworthy, and immoral.

"The memorialists are pleased to give me credit for sympathy with their sufferings. There is, perhaps, no person not himself directly a sufferer, who has had so much reason as myself to feel deeply all the evil effects—the sacrifice not merely of material prosperity, but what is of infinitely greater consequence, of public honor—resulting from this disastrous failure. The reproach which it has brought on the American name has been the only circumstance, which has prevented a residence in the land of my fathers from being a source of unmingled satisfaction to me. You may well believe, therefore, that if any opinion of mine can have an influence (as you suppose) over any portion of my countrymen, favorable to the great end you have in view, it will be, on all proper occasions, as it has been, most emphatically expressed.

"The position gentlemen, of some at least of the indebted states is as singular as it is deplorable. They have involved themselves most unadvisedly in engagements, which would be onerous to much larger and richer communities; and they yet possess, under an almost hopeless present embarrassment, the undoubted means of eventual recovery. I will take the State of Illinois for instance, and what I say of that State will hold of others, making allowance for difference of local circumstances. The State of Illinois undertook a few years since, the construction of a ship canal of about one hundred miles in length, to unite the waters of Lake Michigan with those of the Illinois river; and more recently projected and commenced the execution of 1300 miles of railway. On these works she has borrowed and expended above 2,000,000 of pounds. The works are incomplete and unproductive. The population of the State is that of a second sized English county, short of half a million. It is what in good times would be considered an eminently prosperous population; but I am inclined to think that if the English income tax of last year were, by the Legislature of Illinois, laid on that State, more than half the population possessing in the aggregate that proportion of the taxable property, would, in the present period of general distress, fall below the point of exemption, and that of the other half a small number only would rise much above that point. And yet the undeveloped resources of Illinois are almost boundless. The State is larger than England and Wales. By the Mississippi it is connected with the Gulf of Mexico, by Lake Michigan with the St. Lawrence; and it has a most extensive internal navigation by means of several noble rivers. The climate of the State is mild; it contains I suppose, as large a body of land, not merely cultivable, but highly fertile, as can be found lying together in the United States; it abounds in various kinds of mineral wealth; it is situated about in the centre of a horizontal field of bituminous coal, which Mr. Lyell pronounced the other day to be as large as Great Britain; and it is inhabited by an industrious, frugal, intelligent people, most rapidly increasing in numbers. That such a people will for any length of time submit to lie under the reproach and bear the loss incident to a total prostration of public credit I can never believe.

"I say, gentlemen, the loss as well as the reproach, for wide spread and severe as has been the suffering in this country caused by the default of some of the States, our own losses public and private, I believe to have been greater. The States themselves, as governments, have experienced the greatest embarrassments from the sudden destruction of credit (extending alike to those States which have and which have not honorably and promptly met their obligations; that credit on which alone, in some instances, they depended for the resources necessary to complete and render productive their public works. The general Government of the United States, after having paid off a public debt of more than 200,000,000 of dollars, has found itself unable to negotiate a trifling loan in this great metropolis of the financial world, whose superabundant capital, but for the default of some of the states, would have continued to be for those States themselves, and for individuals, a vast gold mine of unexhausted capacity. In addition to these public embarrassments, private fortunes almost without number have been destroyed in the general wreck of which the failure of the States as cause or effect is one of their principal elements. I doubt if in the history of the world, in so short a period, such a transition has been made from a high state of prosperity to one of general distress, as in the United States within the last six years. And yet gentlemen, the elasticity and power of recovery in the country are great beyond the conception of those who do not know it from personal observation. Even within this disastrous period, to which I have alluded, a private commercial debt to this country, estimated at twenty-five millions of pounds sterling, has been paid by the American merchants, with as little loss to the creditors as would attend the collection of an equal amount of domestic debt, in this or any other country.

"But I will not detain you gentlemen, by enlarging on these topics. The subject I need not tell you, is one which in all respects it is proper that I should speak with reserve. I think I shall have done my duty if I have convinced you that I am keenly sensible of the sufferings of your constituents, and truly solicitous for their effectual relief, and that amidst all the uncertainties and delay which may attend the measure requisite for that purpose, I still feel confident that the time will come when every State in the Union will fulfil its engagement.

EDWARD EVERETT.

CANADA CORN TRADE.—In the House of Commons on the 23d ult., Mr. Ewart asked, whether under the intended measure, foreign corn, imported from any part of the world into Canada, could, on paying the three shilling duty, be exported thence to this country free, like U. S. corn. Mr. Gladstone supposed that Mr. Ewart made the common mistake of thinking that the law regards foreign produce imported into colonies and re-exported, either as colonial produce; which is not the case. But raw materials, brought into the colonies, manufactured there and then imported into this country, were considered as articles of colonial produce, inasmuch as all manufactured articles were considered as the produce of the countries where they were manufactured. Mr. Ewart wished to know whether flour was considered as a manufactured article? Mr. Gladstone said that it was. In reply to Lord John Russell, Mr. Gladstone said that it was the intention of Government to introduce a bill on the subject after Easter.

Advices from Constantinople, of the 23d of February, announce the detection of a conspiracy in Belgrade, having for its object the assassination of Prince Alexander, the new ruler of Servia, and his ministers. The conspirators who have been seized, assert that they have acted at the direct instigation of the Russian Consul; and the Princess Lubitzka, the mother of Prince Michael, is also accused of being implicated. The Governor of Servia has, it is added, removed from Belgrade to Cracowitz.

THE COMET.—After much research, Dr. Forster succeeded in detecting the nucleus of the comet, at Bruges, on the night of the 29th ult.; it had the appearance of a small star of the fourth or fifth magnitude, and was situated in the right line, which joins (Eridani) Eridani, with the Stella Mira Cell.

The London Peace Society has announced a convention of delegates from the various Peace Societies, to assemble in London, on the 22d of June next. The sitting of the convention are expected to continue three days, and will be immediately followed by the Anti-Slavery convention. Joseph Sturge, it seems from the address issued, is the promoter of this meeting.

In the Prerogative court a few days back, three codicils to the will of the late Marquis of Hertford; one of them leaving $100,000 United States Bank stock to Wilson Crooker, were declared invalid.

The Council of Anti-Corn Law League have given the manager of Drury Lane Theatre £500 for the use of the theatre during the five Wednesdays in Lent, making a rent of 100l. for each night. The attendance at the theatre on the nights of these meetings has been immense, and the speeches in favor of the free trade very effective.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has been threatened with assassination by a person named John Dillon, late an officer in the navy. Dillon, it appears, has a claim upon the Government for a large amount, in consequence of the seizure of a vessel engaged in smuggling, some years back, but has never been able to procure a settlement, and, as a pretentious mode of bringing the matter to a close, he expressed his intention of shooting the Chancellor.

DOWNING STREET, March 31, 1843.

At Newcastle-upon-Tyne Asizes John Gray, a married man with four children, and Thompson, were convicted of a series of brutal assaults on a female, and sentenced to transportation for life.

It was stated the other day by Sir Lambert Brunch that but seven lives had been lost in making the tunnel under the Thames, while nearly forty men were killed in the building of the new London bridge.

Late accounts from Oporto report that many houses had been destroyed, and several lives lost by the inundations. The roads were impassable for eight or ten days.

On Tuesday se'night, several hundreds of the unemployed poor at Glasgow had a procession bearing a black flag, whilst several carried boards, bearing inscriptions, one of which was, "Bread or Death."

A letter from Rome of the 28th ult., states that a monk, of Venetian origin, named Abbo, has been sentenced to death for murder, and that the Pope, being appealed to by the culprit, had ordered justice to take its course.

The principal bankers of Leeds have given public notice that henceforth they will allow no more than two per cent on deposits.

The Nuremberg Correspondent states from Vienna that the Austrian government is about to raise a new loan, for the execution of railroads, of 20 to 30 millions of florins.

The strange and even formidable insurrection in South Wales, called Rebecca and her daughters, is treated rather contemptuously by the London press, but the Welsh papers regularly report the progress of the affair.

It seems that the disturbances have grown so formidable, that the government have deemed it necessary to increase still further the military force.

Three threatening notices have been received at Narberth, workhouse, to the effect that unless the parsons have better food given them, Rebecca will attack the house. A mob assembled a few days since, and attacked the Prince's gate. Rebecca, the commander, who has now two officers called "Neil" and "Susan," would seem to emulate the late Captain Rock of the sister island, for, besides the other threatening notices which we have mentioned, one has just been received in this town, breathing destruction to all turnpike gates on the parochial road, and one by Water street, on the old Newcastle Bynllyn road, is doomed to destruction. What is most remarkable in this insurrectionary movement, for it is an insurrectionary movement, though at present perhaps not very formidable, is that neither the civil nor the military, nor the yeomanry, have been able to apprehend a single offender. Thirty veteran pensioners went down from Carmarthen to St. Clear's on Tuesday last, and a troop of lancers are daily expected on the spot. Judging, however, from the past abortive attempts to suppress the lawless movements, people are not very sanguine in their expectations of a restoration of the supremacy of the law.

Indeed, the Captain Rocklike proceedings in Pembrokeshire and Carmarthenshire, seem, from all we can learn, to assume daily a more threatening complexion. A correspondent states that at first the war was directed against the toll gates only, but that now the workhouses are to be levelled also, and that Rebecca is a man of much influence—some say a country magistrate. Another correspondent informs us that the individual who personates Rebecca is frequently replaced by another, and is not the same on the night of each outrage. It is not the least remarkable circumstance in this extraordinary movement, that when the troops appear in one part of the country, Rebecca invariably appears in another, perhaps fourteen or fifteen miles distant.

Railways.—From the annual report of the Board of Trade on railways, it appears that during the last five months of 1842 there were 28 accidents, from which there were 22 deaths, and upwards of 131 cases of personal injury, while during the whole 1841 there were 29 accidents, occasioning 24 deaths, and 71 cases of injury, and 1842 10 accidents with 5 deaths, and 15 cases of personal injury, and this has been out of about 18,000,000 persons carried; and of those killed only one has occurred to passengers, riding in a train and observing the common degree of caution. The total number of passengers carried on 50 railways for one year, ending July 1, 1842, was 18,453,504, that is, 2,028,080 first class; 7,611,935 second class; 4,332,501 third class; and 3,582,057 of a class not distinguished.

Death of Dr. Southey.—We regret to announce the death of Robert Southey, on Tuesday, (March 21,) at his residence in Keswick. For this event his friends must have been long prepared. For the last three years he had been in a state of mental darkness, and a twelvemonth ago he was not able to recognize those who had been his companions from his youth. Scarcely could his wife console herself with the poor hope that he recognized even her. Excess of mental labor in every department of literature—poetry, history, biography, criticism, and philosophy, continued from year to year, without cessation; bowed his strong spirit at last, and obscured the genius which had so long cast a glory on the literature of the age. In early life, when his powerful and brilliant imagination was plunging its wing for the daring flights that it afterwards took, he formed the most exalted notions of the perfectibility of man, indulged in the most generous aspirations for the welfare and improvement of the human race, and seriously thought, with other kindred spirits, of founding a colony in the back woods of America, where guilt and sorrow should be unknown, and perfect equality, freedom, and happiness should reign for ever. A better knowledge of the world soon dissipated these Utopian reveries. As a poet, with exuberance of imagination seldom equalled, and a mastery of versification never surpassed, and as a prose writer, at once elegant and forcible—his name will endure as long as the language in which he wrote. The "wild and wonderful tale" of "Thalaba," and the almost equally wonderful "Curse of Kehama," are the poetical pieces on which his fame will principally rest. As a prose writer he was a perfect model of style, easy but not feeble; stately but not cumbersome; and learned but not pedantic. Besides innumerable articles in the Quarterly Review, to which he was a principal contributor, we believe, for nearly thirty years, his chief prose works are a "Life of Nelson," "The Book of the Church," "A History of the Peninsular War," "Letters from Spain and Portugal," "Essays on the Progress and Prospects of Society," "A History of Brazil," "Lives of the British Admirals," &c. He also wrote biographies of Kirk White and Chatterton, and edited their works, besides editing the collections both of the principal and minor English poets. He was appointed post-laudate in 1812. He was twice married: first in very early life, and again but a few years before the mournful overclouding of his intellect, to Miss Caroline Bowles, a lady whose name as a poetess, had been long and favorably known to the public, and who in the last sad blank years of his life watched over him with the tenderest solicitude, and did all that the most devoted affection could do to lighten the heavy load of his existence.

Dr. Southey was a gentleman in the best sense of the word. His house at the Lakes was ever open to all who presented themselves with suitable introduction, and there are few persons of any distinction who passed through that picturesque region who have not partaken of his hospitality.

REMARKABLE PHENOMENON.
A letter from an officer in the U. S. Army, dated at Fort Leavenworth, Missouri, March 20th, states, that on the 14th of February, at 3 o'clock, A. M. the moon, which had been obscured by a cloud for some hours, burst forth in a deep blood-red color, with a black border of equal proportions over the face, extending beyond the rim; while on the two sides small pieces of rainbow were visible. After continuing in this way for about an hour, the color of the moon changed to its ordinary hue, and the cross became a silvery white, with the edges extending beyond the rim, and touching the rainbows. It continued so for half an hour, and heavy clouds then intervening, obscured the moon, which set unseen. This phenomenon was seen by the hospital attendants, who were up at that hour, some of them very intelligent men, by the guard and sentinels on post, and by several citizens of Weston, a little over five miles off. The next morning the sun rose, accompanied by two snow dogs, as they are commonly called, nearly equal in brilliancy to the sun, and resembling two other stars. This latter scene was witnessed by numbers. In addition, for about two weeks past, every night at seven o'clock, a bright streak of light has appeared in the heavens, coming from the west, and bearing about E. S. E., and resembling very much what is believed to be the tail of a comet. I have thought it my duty to state these things, even at the expense of being discredited, in the hope of eliciting a comparison of observations elsewhere.

Although the phenomena of the system cross on the moon can no doubt be explained from natural causes, yet it will probably be felt by some persons as confirmatory of the prophecies of Father Miller; and be viewed by others with superstitious dread.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEIGHBOR.

Sir,—In looking back to the days of yore we find many great and mighty things have been revealed to man, while in the soft embrace of Morpheus; and indeed, in more modern times, many have told us of awful and bloody wars that have been dragged before the world through dreams. How the mangled body of a delicate and faithful lover was found buried in the interior of a barn, and the monster in human shape detected, and his dark and diabolical deeds developed through a dream three consecutive nights. In fact, so numerous are the instances of three nights' dreaming being verified, that it is now considered as next to infallible. If you are at all sceptical on this point, I pledge myself to bring such evidence as shall cause your doubt to vanish like the morning dew, and you be constrained to exclaim, with Cato, "It must be so." I, too, dream a dream, and although not three successive nights, I may say, with the soldier, "twice are the cock crew I dreamt it again." From what I see in your excellent journal, I am satisfied you must understand deep things and hidden mysteries, and therefore I have been induced to send you my dream, and the interpretation thereof as given to me. For dreaming it three times few can have any doubt of the truth of the whole matter.

Whilst musing on Nauvoo, I reflected upon its rapid increase, its beautiful situation, the excellent character of the inhabitants, and from its hitherto rapid progress, and the vast numbers that are constantly flowing in, I thought in my heart, it is but a little while ere Nauvoo will become the greatest and most important city in the west. One great deficiency, however, I observed, and whether to lay it to the independent high toned feelings of the Editor of the paper in Nauvoo, in not laying these things before the public, or to the want of reflection, or carelessness of the tradesmen and workmen, I was at a loss to determine. I noticed that although in Nauvoo there were merchants and tradesmen of the most brilliant talents, and splendid genius from all parts of the world, that they seemed to be perfectly indifferent about letting the community know where they lived, what trade or calling they followed, what kind of goods they had to dispose of, their price or terms, or any thing else, and that whenever bright they were in many things, that in this one thing they seemed to have no public spirit, nor desire to excel; to know or to be made known: as if they thought that their own reflection without advertising was sufficient to spread light throughout the city. The consequence was being a stranger I wanted a new coat made but not being acquainted with the tailors in Nauvoo, I applied to the Nauvoo Neighbor, as the proper vehicle to convey intelligence of this kind; but I could not find one who advertised as a fashionable tailor, from New York, Philadelphia, London, Dublin, or any other great place. It is true, that in passing through the city I saw a small sign here and there, but fearing that they had no abilities as they do not make themselves known as mechanics, or that they had not public spirit enough to do it. I was afraid of them spoiling my coat, so I declined calling upon them, and thought I would wear my old coat a little longer, rather than have it spoiled by men who were afraid of making themselves known.

As I wanted a pair of fashionable boots made I applied to the same paper, and was in like manner disappointed and mutually concluded that I must go elsewhere; for the boot and shoe makers in Nauvoo have either no talent, or spirit, or they would make themselves known.

I next wanted to find out where I could get my horse shod; but here I was as much at a loss. It is true I saw here and there something resembling a blacksmith shop; but whether they were chain makers, or cable makers, or cutlers, or plough manufacturers, or gunsmiths, or whitewashers I could not ascertain, and the Neighbor did not tell me. Being in need of some store goods, I looked at the Neighbor to see where I could purchase different articles; but I failed again; it is true there were some stores; but whether they sold split, codfish potatoes, red herrings, or butter-milk, I could not determine—whether they sold hats or caps, nails or muslin, soft soap or molasses, ribbons or ropes, I was unable to discover. Whether they sold hardware, or software, or toys, or were tipping shops, the Neighbor was silent on the subject. And I wondered if any one had yet commenced such and such a business, as I had a number of letters from friends abroad enquiring whether I thought their several kinds of business would answer in this place or not; but the Neighbor gave me no information whether there was or was not any of the kinds mentioned, and if there was, where they lived; whether they lived in a house, a cellar, in the woods, or in a cave. While reflecting on this evil, I was lost in a reverie, and without the meretricious charm, I soon became insensible to all around, and the spirit of a dream passed over me. I was suddenly conveyed to the top of an exceeding high mountain, and there I beheld vast multitudes coming up to this place, enquiring their way with their faces lifted upward. Yes, they were coming as a cloud, and like doves to the windows, inasmuch that the inhabitants of the earth said it was a marvelous work and a wonder! An arrow went forth from our city throughout the land, and I beheld that in its course it scattered light like the rays of the sun. And on looking at the source from whence it sprung, I saw a few individuals tolling mightily at a bow, which was fixed and sustained at great expense and labor, and it was so fitted up and prepared that every man in the city might assist in sending forth these arrows into all parts of the earth, but alas! every man was busy attending to his business, and neglecting their duty at the bow, thinking to get rich, not knowing that this was the identical bow that Bunyan speaks of, when he says—

"There was a man, though some did count him mad,
The more he gave away, the more he had.
Thus they were in a great measure blinded to their own interests, but when they saw their duty

THE undersigned, will hereafter run a new and splendid Steam Boat, as a FERRY BOAT across the Mississippi river, between Nauvoo and Montrose, for the accommodation of emigrants, travellers, citizens, and their effects. And they solicit the patronage of a discerning public to sustain the company in this laudable enterprise. The convenience will be great, the accommodation good, and the passage sure, without having to lay by for wind or weather, save when the river is under bonds—of ice. The prices will be regulated by an ordinance of the City Council. Live and let live is the desire of the public's servants, at the bow, and attended to it, they soon began to lay up treasures of abundance. And I beheld that while great men attended to this part of his duty, the rich, and our beautiful city were in confusion. I then looked around to see if I could understand the interpretation, when I saw a person standing on my left who seemed to understand the mechanism and virtue of the bow, whom I addressed as follows:—

"Pray, sir, what does the arrow, spreading light, signify? This (said he) is a vehicle of knowledge, conveying truth to the world, truth is light, thus the arrow represents the Nauvoo Neighbor. How, said I, can every individual assist the circulation of that journal? By advertising in its columns. [I always pass my opinion of the enterprise and philanthropy of a town by the appearance of the public papers.] How can they accumulate wealth quicker when they advertise, seeing they have to pay for it? Because then everybody knows where to find them. Any one seeing a tradesman's advertisement before he leaves home would pass by twenty shops, without calling, to reach the one he started for. I thought that a great many saw their duty and privilege through my dream, and in a little time the arrow glittered as though it had been studded with diamonds, and every body admired. I thought when the arrow first went forth it was said, 'This fit must soon cease; for want of strength at the bow, but the motto was "Who knows it?" In twelvemonths it seemed to have the name and strength of a giant refreshed with new wine, and its flight like that of the comet—unaccountable. Its motto was then changed to "Who would have thought it?" I then thought that vast numbers of letters were sent to you, and the first line that I saw in them was—"Please insert the following in the Neighbor for SIX MONTHS!"

LATEST FROM EUROPE.

By the arrival of the Columbus, at New York, on the 16th, English papers were received to the 22d of March. The overland India mail had arrived, bringing late, but not important news.

The following are the only items of interest. There appears to be little prospect of a mitigation of the corn laws. Lord Montagu, on the 14th, moved for a select committee to inquire into their operation during the last session, but his motion was defeated by 200 to 781. A similar motion was defeated in the Commons by 232 to 1331. Thus it will be seen that the landed interest still controls the action of the Government on this vital matter, and that the principle of even a partial free trade can never be recognized by an aristocracy. Revolution alone can bring relief to the starving millions of Great Britain. On the 16th, Mr. Gladstone stated, on behalf of the ministry, that if American-salted meat had found its way into British ports under the name of colonial produce, it was against the intention of the Government and the act. He had not heard of such importations, and the revenue officers had strict orders to prevent such. On the 19th, Mr. Gladstone, in reply to a question from Lord Worsley, said he did not believe any duty was paid on live stock imported from the United States into Canada. The repeal cause appears to be progressing rapidly in Ireland—the receipts of money for this cause, at the Commercial Exchange, Dublin, having more than doubled.

The lives of the Queen and Sir Robert Peel, have again been threatened, by a "monomaniac" in London, named Stevenson. He is disposed to displace the Queen and place the reins of government in the hands of men. Sir Robert, he thinks, has not fully discharged his duty. This species of insanity is fast spreading amongst the people of England, and, no doubt, will soon become universal. The case of the distress which exists in that country, is beginning to be understood, and the people are determined to effect a cure. Ere long we will have our country filled with the exiled nobles of Great Britain.

The Cotton Market at Manchester was rather improving, on the 17th. Foreign houses had commenced their purchases of cloth for spring shipment, and full prices were obtained, the market closing with an upward tendency.

At Liverpool, also, on the 17th, notwithstanding the large receipts from the United States, there has been little or no pressure on the market, and a fair business in America descriptions has been daily transacted at steady prices, the buyers perhaps having a little advantage, but not to the extent of an 18d per lb., although the brokers have decided upon such a reduction in the quotation of fair Uplands and Mobile Cotton. Brazil has been in very limited demand, and Sarat Cotton has been almost unsaleable. The imports this week, amount to 183,423 bales, and the sales, including 3,300 bales of American taken on speculation, and 400 American for export, to 27,000 bales, viz:—180 Sea Island Georgia, 9s to 24d; 7010 Upland do. 3s 6d to 5 1/2d; 2740 Alabama and Mobile, 3s 9d to 5 1/8d; 13,390 New Orleans, 3s 6d to 5 3/4d.

Liverpool Corn Exchange.—Friday, March 17.—At our market this morning there was a very limited demand for both Wheat and Flour.

Liverpool Precious Market.—Friday, March 17.—The transactions in Irish butter, during the past week, have been very unimportant, and altogether the trade is dull and flat. Bacon hams and lard move off slowly. Beef and pork in demand only for ship's stores.

Money Market.—Great animation had been manifested lately in the money market, capitalists appearing to be more confident in the regulation of the affairs, both at home and abroad. The extraordinary prospect of an abundant harvest forms the principal consideration in favor of the future prosperity of the country, since the Bank of England, and the general banking institution of the Kingdom, are so furnished with superabundance of bullion, that in the event of a harvest which will render foreign supplies not requisite, it is impossible that so much treasure can be much longer allowed to be unemployed.

The comet, it seems, has made its appearance to the star gazers of Paris. It was first seen on the 10th of March, and its sudden discovery created a great sensation. The papers speak of it as the largest ever known, its tail extending over a space of 60 degrees, and proceeding from the constellation Orion. As here, the nucleus was not visible. The astronomers were all on the look out immediately.

Slight shocks of an earthquake, were felt in various parts of England on the 16th of March, but we do not find that any damage was done, beyond the breaking of some glass and China.

The anniversary of Washington's birth, 22nd of February, was commemorated by Mr. Jenifer, our minister to Austria, by a magnificent ball, at Vienna, to which the nobility who usually hang around a Royal Court, were all invited. The foreign Ministers, with many of the most distinguished of the Austrian and Hungarian nobility of both sexes, honored the day by their presence. A fine marble bust of Washington, was conspicuously placed, surrounded by flowers and evergreens, which attracted much attention.

Galdini's Messenger, the English paper of Paris, adds: "The company consisted of about 400 of the elite of Vienna. The night was gay and animated in the extreme, and the dance kept up with spirit until five in the morning, in which their Highnesses the Princesses Metternich and Esterhazy, and the Princess Clary occasionally joined, and imparted additional interest and animation to the festivities of the evening. The absence of Prince Metternich, was deeply lamented, having expressed his own sincere regret, at not having been able to attend either of the Court balls during the season.

Thus, in Vienna, has Washington's birth day been celebrated, evincing that the great and good men of every age are appreciated by the intelligent and noble of every country. The American Minister, used every exertion to render the evening agreeable to his distinguished guests, and has ample cause to be gratified at his success; and the American nation should be proud to know that the name of Washington is held in the highest respect in Europe as well as America. The ball opened with Washington's March, executed by Strauss and his band. His Imperial Highness the Archduke Charles and Princess Metternich, headed the Polonaise.

The birth day of Washington was celebrated, on the 22d ult., by the Americans in Rome, in their usual manner, by a public dinner. About 40 citizens of the United States were present.

A letter from Naples, states that on the 11th ult., a passage boat, containing 30 persons, chiefly inhabitants of Pozzuoli, proceeding from Naples to the Island of Ischia, was suddenly struck by a violent gust of wind, and went down. All the passengers perished.

Letters and papers from Bombay, to the 2d of Feb., arrived by the Overland mail, on the 12th ult.

Sir H. Pottinger, in his last letter to the merchants, dated December 24th, states that the viceroy of Canton, had, in reply to the letter addressed to him, declared his great anxiety, as well as his perfect ability, to protect all foreigners; and had also expressed his readiness to repay such losses as might have been incurred during the late riots, after they should have been correctly ascertained and submitted through Her Majesty's Government.

IMPORTANT INVENTION.

THE BRITANNIA brought up twenty thousand copies of Wilmer & Smith's European Times, containing, with the latest news from the Eastern World, a minute description and engravings of a Flying engine, about to be put in operation. The invention has excited extraordinary interest in England. Several distinguished and scientific men have given in their commendation, and a bill has been brought forward in Parliament to charter a company to put it into practical operation, on an extended scale. The inventor is Mr. Henson.

The principal feature of the invention is the very great expanse of its sustaining plans, which are larger in proportion to the weight to be carried than those of many birds; but if they had been still greater, they would not have sufficed of themselves to sustain their own weight, to say nothing of their machinery and cargo, surely, though slowly, they would have come to the ground. The machine advances with its front edge a little raised; the effect of which is to present its under surface to the air over which it is passing, the resistance of which, acting on it like a strong wind on the sails of a windmill, prevents the descent of the machine and its burthen. The sustaining of the whole, therefore, depends upon the speed at which it is traveling through the air, and the angle at which its under surface impinges on the air in its front; and this is exactly the principle by which birds are upheld in their flight with but slight motion of their wings, and often with none.

But, then, this result, after the start, depends entirely on keeping up the speed, and there remains beyond that the still more formidable difficulty of first obtaining that speed. All former attempts of this kind have failed, because no engine existed which was at once light enough and powerful enough to lift even its own weight, through the air with the necessary rapidity. Mr. Henson has removed this difficulty, partly by inventing a steam engine of extreme lightness and efficiency, and partly by another and very singular device which requires particular notice.

The machine, fully prepared for flight, is started from the top of an inclined plane, in descending which it attains the velocity necessary to sustain it in its further progress. That velocity would be gradually destroyed by the resistance of the air to the forward flight; it is, therefore, the office of the steam engine and the vanes it actuates simply to repair the loss of velocity; it is made, therefore, only of the power and weight necessary for that small effect. Here, we apprehend, is the chief, but not only merit and originality of Mr. Henson's invention; and to this happy thought we shall probably be indebted for the first successful attempt to traverse at will another domain of nature.

The new invention is thus spoken of by the Editor of Newton's Journal of Arts and Sciences, one of the most scientific periodicals of England. The apparatus consists of a car, containing the goods, passengers, engine, fuel, &c.; to which a rectangular frame, made of wood or bamboo cane, and covered with canvas, or oiled silk, is attached. This frame extends on either side of the car in a similar manner to the outstretched wings of a bird; but with this difference, that the frame is immovable. Behind the wings are two verticible fans, furnished with oblique vanes, which are intended to propel the apparatus through the air. These wheels receive motion through bands and pulleys, from a steam or other engine, contained in the car. To an axle at the stern of the car, a triangular frame is attached, resembling the tail of a bird, which is also covered with canvas or oiled silk. This may be expanded or contracted at pleasure, and is moved up and down, for the purpose of causing the machine to ascend or descend. Beneath the tail is a rudder, for directing the course of the machine to the right or to the left; and to facilitate the steering, a sail is stretched between two masts, which rise from the car.

The amount of canvas or oiled silk necessary for buoying up the machine is stated to be equal to one square foot for each half pound weight, whole apparatus weighing about 3,000 lbs., and the area of surface spread-out to support it, 4,500 square feet in the two wings, and 1,500 in the tail, making altogether 6,000 square feet. The engine is proposed to be from 25 to 30 horse power. It is stated in the specification that on launching the machine into the air, an elevated situation must be selected, and the machine allowed to run some distance down an inclined plane, for which purpose vertical wheels are attached to the bottom of the car or boat. When the machine has thus acquired a momentum, the rotary fan wheels are put in action to raise it into the air and propel it; the rudder appended to the car is then used for regulating its course.

In concluding our hasty remarks on this invention, we would remind our readers that many projects of a like character have been promulgated to the world by enthusiastic projectors, all of which have fallen to the ground, (we use a figure of speech, for they have never risen,) from the fact of having overlooked the laws of matter, and miscalculated the powers of mechanism in imitating the functions of animal life.

The Times says that it would not be the most astonishing thing in the world for the people of New York, Philadelphia, and Boston, to receive a visit from one of these "fliers" before they know it.

An Ordinance in relation to Swine running at large.

Sec. 1. Be it ordained by the City Council of the City of Nauvoo, That from and after the passage of this act, it shall not be lawful for any person or persons owning hogs or swine to allow the same to run at large within the limits of said city.

Sec. 2. And it is hereby further ordained that a fine of five dollars for every hog or swine shall be imposed upon any person or persons suffering their swine to run at large within the limits of said city; said fine to be imposed by the Mayor or any Alderman of said city upon the complaint of any person or persons aggrieved, and to be collected of the goods and chattels of the defendant as in common action of debt.

Sec. 3. And be it further ordained, That from and after the passage of this act, it shall be lawful for any citizen or constable to take up any swine found running at large within the bounds of said city, and convey them to the Marshal of said city, who shall give three days notice, posted up in three public places in the city, in writing, and if no owner shall appear and pay all expenses incurred by virtue of this act, said swine shall be sold at public auction to the highest bidder, and after deducting all necessary expenses, the proceeds shall be paid into the City Treasury.

Sec. 4. And be it further ordained, That the Marshal of said city be allowed twenty-five cents per day for keeping such hogs or swine, and ten per cent of the proceeds of sales made by him in accordance with the provisions of this ordinance.

This ordinance to take effect, and be in force from and after its passage.

Child Roasted to Death.—A woman named Mary Frost, has been sentenced in Norwich, Conn., to two years imprisonment in the Penitentiary. She quarreled with one Sarah Gardner, tore her clothes, forced her out of doors and took from her her child, which she retained.

When she forced the mother out of doors, she told her she would burn up her child. In one hour the mother returned, forced open the outside door, went to her own room and found her child lying in front of the fire, in the agonies of death. It had been placed so near the coals as to roast to death. The wretch! She ought to have been scourged.—Phil. Spirit Times.

Cousining.—A country gentleman lately arrived at Boston, and immediately repaired to the house of a relative, a lady, who had married a merchant of that city. The parties were glad to see him, and invited him to make their house his home, (as he declared his intention of a morning in the city but a day or two.) "The husband of the lady, anxious to show attention to a relative and friend of his wife, took the gentleman's horse to a livery stable in Hanover street. Finally, the visit became a visitation, and the merchant, after a lapse of eleven days, found besides lodging and boarding the gentleman, a pretty considerable bill had run up at the livery stable. Accordingly he went to the man who kept the stable and told him when the gentleman took his horse he would pay the bill. "Very good," said the stable keeper, "I understand you." Accordingly, in a short time, the country gentleman went to the stable and ordered his horse to be got ready.—The bill, of course, was presented.

Oh, said the gentleman, "Mr. so and so, my relation will pay this."

"Very good, sir," said the stable keeper; "please to get an order from Mr. —; it will be as good as the money."

The horse was put up again, and down went the country gentleman to the Long Wharf, where the merchant kept.

"Well," said he, "I am going now."

"Are you?" said the merchant, "well, good bye, sir!"

"Well,—about my horse; the man says the bill must be paid for his keeping."

"Well, I suppose that is all right, sir."

"Yes,—well, but you know I'm your wife's cousin."

"Yes," said the merchant, "I know that you are, but your horse is not!"

MY TOMB.

BY L. C. LITTLEFIELD.

When from this world I'm gone,
On earth no more to bloom,
Remember, mortal man,
Raise o'er my dust no tomb.
Let ceremonies there Expire with my last breath;
Oh, let me rest in peace,
When low I lay in death.
When I am free from clanging time's abuse,
Let me rest, within my "narrow house."

Let but my simple name
Adorn that sacred spot,
By that, oh, let me ease,
Or be by that forgot;
If that with honor fail,
To crown my silent clay,
Then let the world forget
The god which which I lay.
My name is lost to this false world I'll will Be it an ocean, or beat a mill.

But if in some fond heart,
Far down time's dizzy maze,
Kind memory should fan
Its embers to a blaze;
O touch its sweetest chord
With thoughts of other years,
Till friendship's fabric o'er
Each time tell how years
Its twining crest—let such a one draw near
And o'er my humble grave, let fall one faithful Tear.

But those whose golden tales Prove in the end to be A bubble on the wave,
Blown up with treachery;
From "neath whose friendly cloak
A viper fain would glide
And sting my happiness.

When fortune's ill betide:
Should then not list my name, or give one Thought,
If my wish, now, could then accomplish ought.

THE PAST.

Thou hauntest the cells of the inmost soul,
Like a ghost that roams when the night clouds roll.
And thy voice is heard by the thoughtful mind,
Like the tones of the dead borne on by the wind.
We cherish the image of every hour,
As a frail would do to a withered flower;
For the thought of love to her heart it brings,
And thou hast bright spots on thy pictured wings.

To the childless heart that dwelleth in care,
Thou bringest bright locks of clustering hair;
And the smiles once worn, play round her own brow.
And fill up the place of the lost and the blest;
Like the placid stars, in the midnight skies,
Shine the holy lights of the loving eyes
That sparkle thy dome; and, with nought of gloom,
They beckon us on to the speechless tomb.

What memories flit o'er the withered brain,
Representing old pictures of joy or pain,
And whispering softly the half-forgotten
In this lengthen'd tale of our changeful lot!
To the pure, and good, thou canst sing again
Nought but a soft melody that strain,
Such as the wild bird would chaunt on the spray
When streaked gold clouds watch the lingering day.

But, ah! to the child of darkness and sin
What flowing winds thou bringest within:
Like storm clouds, like thoughts one another do chase.
Till his anguish'd soul is worn by the race.
Oh, let me then dwell with the beautiful;
Of love to my mind, let my heart be full;
Let purity shed o'er my path her light,
And holiness guard through trials and night.

Then shall all memories be gentle and sweet,
Like echoing tread of some fairy feet,
And songs of the Past be chaunted again
To soothe into sleep the wailings of pain.
As clouds in the west stretch after the sun,
Or as eyes are turned to the lingering west,
So may I still look from my own bright west
To the Past, and hear its low song of rest.

Agricultural.

AN ESSAY ON THE CULTIVATION OF HEMP.

Concluded.

Hemp may be sowed at any time between the 10th of April and last of May, when the ground is in a proper state for sowing, that is, neither too wet nor too dry. Early sowed hemp generally produces the best crop. It would be best to sow not later than the 20th of May, if it can be avoided, but hemp sowed the 10th of June will make itself before frost, though in general, the crop will be light. To give time to cut a large crop of hemp before it become too ripe, it should be sowed at different times, so as to allow four or five weeks between the first and last sowing. Some seasons hemp may be sowed as early as the first of April. Frosts may not destroy it, but if sowed too early, its growth may be considerably checked by a succession of cold frosty weather after the hemp gets up. This will have the effect of preventing it from attaining the height to which it ought to grow, and will considerably reduce the yield per acre. There is, however, not much danger of this, if not sowed before the 10th of April. If the last sowing be on the 20th of May, there will be a period of forty days between the first and last sowing. This will produce such a difference in the period of ripening, as to give sufficient time for cutting and ricking.

The time for cutting or pulling hemp is indicated by the leaves of the hemp becoming yellow, and most of them dropping off. Upon a close examination about this period, it will be found that some of the blossom stalks will have entirely shed their leaves, and begun to turn of a dark color, having lost their yellow hue. When this discovery is made, no time should be lost in cutting or pulling the hemp. But it may stand a week longer without any material injury, except that the blossom hemp will not take so good a rot, and will be somewhat worse to break.

There is still some difference of opinion as to the best mode of securing hemp after it is ripe. Pulling is still practiced by some, and it is probable more lint can be saved in that way than by cutting. It is certain that by cutting some lint will be lost; as with the utmost care two or three inches next the ground must be lost. On the other hand, many advantages attend the cutting of hemp, which will more than overbalance this loss. Cutting is more expeditious than pulling. There is considerably less weight to handle in all the subsequent operations, such as taking up and binding, loading, and hauling out to spread for rotting, again taken up and shocking, and finally, the trouble and expense of breaking (the price of breaking pulled hemp being considerable higher). In all these operations the roots are very much in the way, and particularly so in spreading, and considerably increase the time requisite for going through the various manipulations the hemp must undergo. In a word, when hemp is cut, the hemp grower can manage a much larger crop, which will greatly more than counterbalance the loss by cutting. To this should be added, that cut hemp makes superior lint, and will always have a preference over that which has been pulled, because of the coarse bark which comes off that part of the stalk near the ground forming a part of the lint of the latter. Another advantage in favor of cutting is, that the roots and stubble, when ploughed under, have a tendency to render the soil light, and when decomposed, forms a slight dressing of manure. These considerations should give a decided preference to cutting over pulling of hemp. With hemp hooks, tolerable hands will cut, on an average, half an acre a day; with cradling scythes, (W. L. Larimore's) an acre may be cut with each, by good hands, in hemp not exceeding six or seven feet high. If hemp is cut by scythes, it is not so well managed with scythes. This instrument requires a smooth bottom to do good work.

When hemp is cut or pulled, it should be spread on the ground, keeping the but ends even, and should be suffered to lie till well cured. This will require a week, or somewhat less; if the weather is clear and warm. If it get a rain, in the meantime, it will be an advantage, as it will cause the leaves more readily to leave the stalks.

There are different modes of treating the hemp crop after it is cut and cured. By some the leaves are beat off, and without binding it in sheaves, it is put in shocks, tying two bands round each, one near the top and the other about eighteen inches lower down. In this condition it is suffered to remain till the proper period for spreading it out to rot. By others it is bound in sheaves (some bearing the leaves off and some not) and put up in shocks, where it is suffered to stand till there is leisure, when it is put in stacks or ricks. A third practice, and that which I deemed the best, is to take up the hemp as soon as it is sufficiently cured, and bind it in sheaves, without beating off the leaves. The binders throw the sheaves into two rows, with a sufficient space between for a wagon to pass. While the process of taking up and binding is going on a wagon and three hands (two to pitch and one to load) is engaged in hauling the hemp to the rick, and ricking it. The rick should be in a central part, so as to require the hemp to be removed as short a distance as possible.

Thus the process of taking up, binding, hauling, and ricking, all progress together. In this way five hands will put up a stout rick in two days; and cover it. By having two wagons and ten hands, it may be accomplished in one day. It is proper to remark, that for making the roof to the rick, it is necessary to have long hemp, from which the leaves should be beat off. In this state only will hemp make a secure roof. Ricking is preferable to stacking, because the former secures completely all the hemp from the weather, except that which composes the roof, while stacking leaves the butts exposed. The first practice, above suggested, is objectionable upon the ground that the outside of all the stacks are exposed to the weather for several months before the time for spreading arrives, and is generally much injured by the weather, especially during wet falls. If the fall should be very dry, the outside of all the shocks will still be partially rotted; and as these must be spread with the part of the hemp which has had no rain or dew, they will be too much watered before the balance is fit to be taken up, and sometimes be entirely ruined.

The second practice, where the leaves are beat off, is objectionable, because of the great increase of labor, the process of beating off leaves being very slow and tedious; and when the leaves are not beat off, though there is not so much extra labor, if the weather is favorable, yet there is danger in the hemp being seriously injured if there should be much rain. The rain will gradually penetrate the shocks to the very centre, and the consequence of the leaves being backed so closely, the shocks cannot dry without opening them and loosening the tops of each sheaf. And while drying, there will be a risk of again getting wet from rain. This plan is therefore, more objectionable than beating off the leaves before shocking. I am satisfied, from actual experiment, (having tried all these different methods) that the best way of managing hemp, after it is cut and cured is to bind and rick it as hereinafter described, without beating the leaves off, except for the cover.

If the hemp be well cured and ricked, when perfectly dry, many of the leaves will, shatter off in the process of ricking. Most of those remaining on the hemp will shake off when it is hauled out and spread. It is an advantage to have the leaves pre y well separated from the stalks, before or at the time of spreading out to rot. But this object will be sufficiently attained by the handling of the hemp in the different processes of binding, hauling out, and spreading.

There is a difference of opinion, also, as to the best ground upon which to spread hemp. Some choose meadow ground, in preference to any other place. I formerly pursued that practice, but have abandoned it, from a perfect conviction that the ground upon which the hemp grows is the most suitable to spread it for rotting.

1. This saves much time in ricking, as the ricks may always be on the ground on which the hemp grew, and as nearly central as may be to that part of the hemp which is to be put in the rick.

2. All the manure arising from the leaves, half formed seed, &c., will be left on the ground.

3. The hemp rots or is watered quicker and more regularly than it does on grass land.

4. If spread on hemp ground you are sure to guard against stock running there, and the ground is consequently kept in good condition for another crop. Besides the ground is benefited by being covered with the hemp while rotting.

5. If spread on meadow ground, much of the grass will be injured by burning the hemp shives; and if the hemp is not sufficiently watered before the grass springs up among it, it will not obtain a good rot, and may be seriously injured.

The best time for spreading hemp is in the month of December. It then receives what is called "a winter rot," and makes the lint of the hemp a light color, and its quality better than if spread out early. But where a farmer has a large crop, it is desirable to have a part of his hemp ready to take up late in December so that he may commence breaking in January. To accomplish this object, a part of his crop may be spread about the middle of October. It would not be prudent to spread earlier, as hemp will not obtain a good rot if spread out when the weather is warm.

The experienced hemp-grower is at no loss to tell when hemp is sufficiently watered. A trial of a portion of it on the break, will be the best test for those who have not had much experience. When sufficiently watered, the stalks of the hemp lose that hard sticky appearance or feel which they retain till the process is completed. The lint also begins to separate from the stalk, and the fibres will show themselves somewhat like the strings of a fiddle bow, attached to the stalk at two distant points, and separate in the middle. This is a sure indication that the hemp has a good rot.

Some have advised that hemp, after it has been sufficiently water-rotted, should be put under cover. This is certainly an error. If, after hemp is sufficiently watered it is put in large masses, it goes through a sweating process, which toughens it, and renders it much more difficult to break. Besides, it would cost much labor to haul it from the field, in which it was spread, put it under a shelter, and again remove it some distance, from the shelter to break it out. In these different handlings, the hemp would be a good deal tangled, and much loss of lint would result therefrom. The erection of suitable buildings for the purpose would, moreover, be attended with considerable expense. All this extra labor and expense is wholly unnecessary. When hemp is fit to be taken in, it should be immediately put in shocks, without binding, of suitable size. If it is dry, the shocks should be immediately tied, with a hemp band, by drawing the tops as closely together as possible, in order to prevent the rain from wetting the inside. If carefully put up and tied, they will turn rain completely. Each shock should be large enough to produce from fifty to sixty pounds of lint. If the hemp should be considerably damp, when taken up, the shocks should be left untied at the tops until they have time to dry. If shocks are not well put up, they are liable to blow down by a strong wind. To guard against this, it is desirable, when commencing a shock, to tie a band around the first armful or two that may be set up, and then raise up the parcel so tied, and beat it well against the ground, so as to make it stand firmly, in a perpendicular direction. The balance of the shock should now be set regularly around the part as herein directed. If hemp be carefully shocked, it will receive little or no injury till the weather becomes warm. In the meantime it should be broke out as rapidly as possible. If the operation be completed by the middle of April, no material loss will be sustained. If delayed to a later period, more or less loss of lint will be the consequence. Cool, frosty weather is much the best for hemp-breaking. In that state of the weather, if the hemp is good, first rate hands on the common hemp break, will clean two hundred pounds per day, upon an average. Two of my best hands, during the past season, for every day they broke, favorable and unfavorable, averaged one hundred and eighty six pounds. Two others, who are young men and not full hands, averaged one hundred and forty four pounds. The ordinary task for hands is one hundred pounds. Over work is paid for at the usual price of breaking.

Many efforts have been made to clean hemp by machinery, but hitherto without success. At least no method has yet been discovered, that answers as well as the common hand break. This is so commonly in use as to render its description unnecessary.

Good hemp land, in Mason county, will, upon an average, in ordinary seasons, yield a ton (2,250 lbs.) for every three acres. In favorable seasons, and upon first rate ground, I have known over 1,200 pounds per acre produced. But this is a very uncommon yield. Five acres of my last year's crop, measured and broke out by itself, produced 4,911 pounds, equal to 928 pounds per acre, though my crop was considerably shortened by the dry season.

The success with which hemp can be raised on the same ground, for a number of years, is very remarkable. There is scarcely any other crop, that will not deteriorate the soil, by being grown on the ground, for a succession of years.

The Farmer's Guide states, upon good authority, that "thirteen or fourteen successive crops were taken from the same field, and that the last was the best." I have no doubt of the correctness of this statement, because it conforms to my own experience. A field containing twelve and a half acres, upon which nine or ten successive crops have been grown, produced last season 8,800 pounds of hemp, equal to 738 pounds per acre, though the season had become very dry some time before the hemp had attained its growth. This was quite as good a yield, taking into consideration the unfavorableness of the season, as I ever had from the same ground.

I have never discovered the smallest diminution of crop, except what may be fairly ascribed to the unfavorableness of the season. It may therefore be laid down as a well settled principle, that hemp is not an exhausting crop. This may be accounted for upon rational principles. First, vegetables that have a profusion of leaves in proportion to their stalk and root, derive a large proportion of their aliment from the atmosphere of substances mingled with it than those differently constructed; second, plants exhaust a great deal more while ripening their seed than at any previous period of their growth; third, all other circumstances being equal, those crops which most completely protect the ground from the rays of the sun, and the evaporating effects of the winds must be most favorable to the preservation of its fertility. In all these respects the hemp crop is very favorable. Even after it is cut it still covers the ground until it is put in ricks, and being again spread on the same ground during the winter, it saves the soil from the deteriorating effects of stock, running upon it. If we add to all these advantages, that it receives from the hemp all the leaves, blossoms, pollen imperfect seed, &c., which annually serves as a dressing of manure, we shall not be surprised that the hemp should have little or no tendency to deteriorate the soil.

A BEATTY.

Foreign.

Still later from Canton.—The ship Splendid, Capt. Land, arrived at N. York yesterday morning, bringing Canton papers to the 27th December, ten days later than by the Delhi. Affairs at Canton were still in a very unsettled state, though nothing of importance had transpired during the ten days previous to the departure of the Splendid.

The Canton papers are occupied with the Correspondence between the British Plenipotentiary, respecting the recent riot and destruction of the British Factories at Canton. The British Plenipotentiary considers the Chinese as having been provoked by the Lascars, belonging to British ships, and throws the blame, therefore, of the occurrence on the British merchants, for not sufficiently restraining the crews of their vessels.

The British merchants, in reply, claim that their information on the spot, of the origin and motives of the riot, is more to be trusted than reports that may have reached the Plenipotentiary at Hong Kong. That as to the doubt whether timely notice was given to the authorities of the riot, there is no room for it, as such notice was admitted by the Chinese themselves to have been received; and as to the more important part of Sir H. Pottinger's letter, which asks whether the British merchants have ever done anything to facilitate the operations of their own Government in China, whether they have, indeed, thrown obstacles in its way—the merchants repel the insinuation with many frankness, and intimate distinctly that neither their advice nor co-operation has ever been invited, nor their interests apparently begun at all taken into account.

The reply of the Secretary of the Plenipotentiary acknowledges the letter which will, it says, be transmitted to H. M. Government. It adds that the Viceroy of Canton had assured Sir H. Pottinger that he was both willing and able to protect all foreigners and has expressed his willingness to pay for such losses incurred during the riot as shall have been correctly ascertained and submitted through H. M. Government.

The Canton Register contains two Imperial decrees of the 10th and 21st November—the first ordering Yishar, who failed to defend Canton against the barbarians, (English) and Wancow Yehking, who failed to save Ningpo, Teapoo and other towns, to be surrendered to the civil authorities; and the second announcing the result of the deliberations of the council of punishments, namely, that they should be "degraded, dismissed the public service, shut up in prison, and their heads to be cut off next autumn."

Disturbances in Prince Edward's Island.—The New Brunswick says, some outrages have been committed in King's County, in this Island, which may yet lead to more disastrous results. It appears that one of the tenants had been ejected by legal process, whereupon about 300 of them assembled and reinstated him. The house of Lawrence McGuire, in Township No. 45, had been burned by the mob. The Lieutenant Governor has offered a reward of £200 to any person who will give information that may lead to the discovery of the perpetrators of the deed, and a like reward, and free pardon, to any person accessory to the deed, not being principal.

About thirty of the soldiers garrisoned at Charlottetown, and a strong party of constables, have been despatched to the scene of outrage, with a view to the re-establishment of peace, and the apprehension of offenders.

FOURTEEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The Packet Ship Columbus, from Liverpool, arrived at New York, brings London papers to the 20th, and Liverpool to the 22nd ult. inclusive. The news is not important.

Information of the riots at Canton had reached London by the overland mail also of the massacre by the Chinese, at Formosa, of the crew and passengers (chiefly Indian) of two British vessels, the Nerbudda and the Ann, subsequent to the treaty of Nankin. Of 240 natives of India, on board the Nerbudda, all but two were executed or died. Of 67 on board the Ann, of whom 14 were Europeans, eleven only escaped, six Europeans and five Indians. Sir H. Pottinger demands reparation in the dismissal of the authorities, who perpetrated this crime, and the confiscation of their property, and adds, that "a refusal of reparation might be the cause of further serious misunderstanding; nay, that it might lead a renewal of hostilities between the empires."

The English journalists do not appear to apprehend any serious consequences from these occurrences. The Viceroy at Canton had expressed his readiness to repay all losses that had been incurred during the riots, and declared his anxiety, as well as his perfect ability, to protect all foreigners.

The trial of the Chartists was concluded on the 9th ult. The Jury delivered their verdict after twenty minutes deliberation. They found Feargus O'Donnor and fourteen others guilty on the 5th indictment, charging them with conspiring together to endeavor to persuade others to persist in unlawful assembling, and by terror and alarm, to bring about and procure changes in the laws and constitution of the realm.

This is the count as to which the judge had expressed some doubt, whether by law it is an offence, and whether any judgment can pass. Sixteen were found guilty on the 4th count, charging them with aiding, abetting and encouraging others to continue and assist in impeding the said trades, &c. and causing terror and alarm, &c. &c.; and also with encouraging the said parties to continue and to persist in said unlawful assemblies, and by terror and alarm, to bring about and procure certain great changes in the laws and constitution of this realm. The rest were acquitted.

The court then adjourned, it being understood the defendants would be called up for judgment during the next term.

The shock of an earthquake was very generally and distinctly felt in Liverpool and the country round about, on the 17th ult. and from the description given its effects must have been more marked in some of the neighboring villages than in the town of Liverpool itself.

The Bank of England has declared a dividend of £3, 10 per cent. for the half year ending 5th of April, deducting therefrom 7 pence in the pound on account of income tax.

London, March 20th.—The Paris papers of Saturday, 18th have since reached us by express. They are wholly destitute both of political and domestic news.

The only event which has given rise to serious prognostications, and which is the subject of conversation in all scientific circles, was the appearance, on Friday evening, in the horizon, of an immense comet.

This occurred towards 7 o'clock P. M. The tail which is wide, expanded, and perfectly marked, extended over a space of more than 60 degrees. Leaving Orion, whilst it crossed under an angle of 40 degrees, this stupendous and magnificent tail gradually became invisible in the horizon, which was still under the influence of twilight. The nucleus of the comet was not visible.

Revolution in Hayti.—By the recent arrival from this unfortunate Republic, we learn that nearly the whole country has declared themselves in favor of the reform government. This feeling was at first confined entirely to the south, but as the army of the reformers proceeded towards Port au Prince, provinces after provinces were subdued without bloodshed, and proclaimed their adhesion to the provincial Government. President Boyer, learning of the approach of the provincial army of the south towards the capital, sent out a large army under the command of General Mirault to arrest their progress, and if possible, to destroy them. Upon the issue of this battle seemed to have depended the future stability of Hayti. Accordingly about 6 leagues from Port au Prince on Sunday or Monday the 6th or 7th inst. The President's army was addressed by the Provincial General to the effect that they did not make war against the people—that they desired no bloodshed—that their quarrel was with one man (the President) who had enslaved Hayti—had kept her people ignorant that he might the more easily rivet the yoke upon them, and by his policy he had demoralized her people and reduced them to poverty—that it was with this man only they quarrelled, and it was necessary for the happiness and prosperity of Hayti that he should be removed. This powerful address was answered by a discharge of cannons from the ranks of President Boyer's Life Guards, which had the effect of killing fifteen or sixteen of their opponents. Upon this the cannons of the Provincial Army were unmuzzled, and a heavy discharge followed, which killed and wounded some fifty or sixty of the President's men.

The regiments of the line, unwilling to continue the combat, marched over to the ranks of the Provincial army, which opened to receive them. The President's Life Guards perceiving what had taken place, commenced a retreat, intelligence of which led the President to the conclusion that all was lost, and that it was necessary to seek safety in flight. Such of his things as could be got together were hastily removed on board the Seylla, a British vessel-of-war lying in the harbor of Port au Prince, and these were followed by the President's household and immediate friends. Canine Fidelity.—The Providence Journal relates the following incident of canine fidelity, which lately occurred in that city.—A bright and interesting child, some four years old, the son of a merchant of this city, was much attached to a fine Newfoundland dog, about a year younger than himself, and the attachment was fully reciprocated. They were constant companions, and the little fellow was scarce ever without his shaggy play-fellow. The boy was taken sick; and the dog watched his bed with a solicitude that was most affecting. He was almost constantly in the room, and when the physician made his daily calls, he would look from him to the child with an expression that could not be mistaken, and which plainly showed that he understood both the object of the visit and the danger of his little master. The child died. The dog never tasted food afterward; he refused every attention and every attempt to console him, and in three days he died. Kind friends laid the noble brute by the side of the boy he loved so well, and tears of genuine sorrow moistened the turf that covered his noble heart. Who shall say that the spirit which animated such affection, died with the body that vainly strove to confine it?

A Lucky Thought.—During the earlier part of the French invasion of Algiers, a small party of French troops fell into an Arab ambush, and those who were not immediately slain or taken prisoners, were obliged to put more trust in their heels than in their muskets. It happened that the regimental band was with the party; and the musicians made a retreat with the rest, in a prestissimo movement of the most rapid execution.—The optimistic player, was however, embarrassed by his instrument, and he was hesitating about carrying it farther, when happening to cast a furtive glance behind, to his consternation he beheld an Arab horseman close upon him. Farther flight was useless: there was nothing for him to do but to fight or surrender.—Years of desert slavery made a gloomy prospect, and yet, what could his side sword avail against the spear of his pursuer. Desperation is the parent of many strange resources. The lately abused opifex, was lifted to his shoulder, musket fashion, and the muzzle brought to cover his foe. The Arab was struck with panic. Doubtless this was some devilry of those accursed Ghouls—some machine of death, with a mouth large enough to sweep half his tribe into eternity. Not a second did he hesitate, but wheeling round he galloped off at a pace that soon took him out of what he conceived might be the range of the grandfather of all muskets. Our musician made good his retreat, with a higher opinion of the powers of his instrument than he had ever possessed, and the story was the amusement of the French army for many a day after.

Thomas Hood is very luminous on the subject of the comet. Hear him!

The Comet.—We are not scientific Astronomers, and cannot direct Telescopes to the exact spot; but we understand from the Jargonists that its nucleus is somewhere in a Latin constellation, and that the tail passes through a Greek Star, goes over an Arabian one, under a Hebrew one, then squeezes between two Danish ones, just brushes a Swedish one, wriggles through a High Dutch cluster, and terminates through a small fry of Chinese nebulæ. Others report that the Comet has been postponed to allow time for the Astrologers to predict it; and there is a very general impression that the Phenomenon comes skylarking too near us, it is to be apprehended as an eccentric body.

Marriage Extraordinary.—We find the following account of a most "extraordinary" and unnatural marriage, in the New York Courier. "There are few of our readers in this city or in any of the principal towns in the country, who have not seen the famous united brothers, the Siamese twins. They have been residing for several years past in North Carolina, where they purchased a plantation. We had not heard of them for a long time, when we received a letter yesterday from a correspondent in North Carolina, informing us that they had entered a state of double blessedness. Our correspondent says:—On Thursday, April 13th, married at Wilkes Co. N. C., by elder Colby Sparks, of the Baptist Church, Messrs. Chang and Eng, the Siamese twin brothers, to Misses Sarah and Adelaide, daughters of Mr. David Yeates, of Wilkes Co. N. C." Of this, the New York Commercial says:—"Extraordinary indeed. So much so, that were it not for the evidence daily afforded of what unnatural things men and women will do, we should pronounce the account incredible. What sort of women can they be who have entered into such a marriage? What sort of father to consent? What sort of clergyman he who performed the unnatural ceremony."

The Rothschilds.—A curious fact appears in the "Occident," translated for that work from a French publication. "The widowed mother of the wealthy bankers Rothschilds, while her sons inhabit palaces in London, Paris, Vienna, Naples, and Frankfurt, still resides in the small house in the Jewish quarter of Frankfurt (on the main) in which her husband lived and died. Upon his death she declared that 'she would only leave for the tomb the modest dwelling that had served to cradle this name, this fortune, and these children.' The house is so remarkable for modesty, that it forces the attention of the stranger. It unfolds the trait of the Hebrews, as old as the affection and respect of the wives of the Patriarchs for their lords.

Something an obstacle.—Merit is often the obstacle to fortune, and the reason is, because it always produces two bad effects—envy and fear. Envy in those who cannot rise to the same degree of perfection, and fear in those who are established, and who dread that by advancing a man possessed of more abilities and merit than themselves, they may be supplanted. It will, however, work its way in the end; if accompanied with perseverance and energy.

Most horrible Murder of a Wife by her Husband.—A slip from the office of the Baltimore Sun gives the details in a case of one of the most atrocious murders which it has ever been our painful task to record. The name of the guilty demon is John Horn, and the name of the unfortunate victim, Malinda Hinkle his wife. This wretch, at the age of nearly sixty years, married not long since, Malinda Hinkle, about 16 years of age, and retired to a lot of land which he recently purchased, about five miles above Reisterstown on the Hanover road; The horrid deed was perpetrated on the night of the 16th of March, the night on which there was such a heavy fall of snow, and nothing occurred to awaken suspicion until Sunday last, when a young sister of the deceased, named Catherine, came to the conviction from the unsatisfactory account given by Horn of the disappearance of his wife, that she had been murdered by him. A suitable search was instituted, and on last Monday morning, a party set out for the purpose and proceeded to Horn's dwelling. Having arrived they found the house and store in such a condition as plainly to show that its master had deserted it under some strong and unaccountable impulse.—The neighborhood was fully examined during the day. At four o'clock in the afternoon a revelation was made of a deed of the deepest atrocity. Less than a quarter of a mile from the house, two feet under ground, and enclosed in an old coffee bag, was found the trunk of the unfortunate Malinda. In a few minutes after, the party proceeded to the house and found in the garret, inclosed within another coffee bag, the legs and arms. The head could not be found. These parts disinterred were in quite as good preservation as if the murder had been but recent—a circumstance which clearly shows that they had been disposed of in a different way until the murderer, through fear of detection, had placed them as they were discovered.

This conclusion is fully justified by the condition in which the clothes of the murderer were found. His shoes and vest were soiled with a species of clay similar to that in which the body was interred. It was, therefore, pretty clear that the person of the victim had been thus mutilated in this manner, and kept in liquor until recently, when they were buried; but after he found that search would be made on Monday morning, with a hope that he might escape detection, he brought the legs and arms to the house—no one can discover with what propriety, except that providence wisely determined to strengthen the chain of evidence by this additional link in order to identify the guilty perpetrator beyond the possibility of doubt.

Horn is a man between fifty and sixty years of age, a German, about 5 feet 4 or 5 inches high, well built, and it is supposed when he changed the clothes which were found for others, that he put on such as he was accustomed to use on particular occasions—blue frock coat and pantaloons.

Horn—The Murderer.—A Baltimore paper states that the keeper of the jail in which this double murderer is confined, is run down with applications from persons desirous of visiting his cell. How strange it is that men should desire to look at such a monster.

"My Son," said a pious old lady to her son, after she had read to him a chapter in scripture, relating to Jonah, "how must Johnny have felt when the whale swallowed him!" "Sort of 'gown in the mouth, I s'pose," replied the little rascal.

Prophecy of the End of the World in 1843.—A gentleman in Marshallfield, Va., has in his possession a few old newspapers and among them a Boston paper, printed in 1741, containing a notice of a prophecy of the end of the world in 1843.

Royal Nursery Circular.—The London Punch says a number of capital things. Among others we have recently seen the following:—"The Prince of Wales was safely delivered of a tooth one day last week, when Sir Charles Ross, the miniature painter, received instructions for drawing it. Prince Albert walked for some time on the slopes; but it is not true that he has been upon the decline since his arrival at Windsor. When descending the Slopes, he is, of course, to a certain extent, going down hill, which may account for the rumor. The Prince of Wales was rather fretful on Thursday last, and Black Rod was ordered to be in attendance. The aid of Black Rod was however, dispensed with. The Princess's Royal clean pinafore was taken for an airing on the horse usually occupied for similar purposes.—On the anniversary of the Queen's marriage an entertainment was given in the royal nursery. Lollipops were laid for two and in the evening there was an exhibition of the magic lantern.

Horrible—A Mother and Child Starved to Death.—On Saturday last a gentleman brought to our village the following heart rending account. An Irishman with his family some time since took up his residence in Florence in this County, four or five miles from the village, and a mile from any neighbor.

Last summer the man was killed by the falling of a tree, leaving a wife and three small children. Left thus alone, the poor woman managed to sustain herself and little ones comfortably, till winter with its severity came upon her. The deep snow shut her up within her little cabin and she was soon forgotten by the world without. One of her near neighbors chancing to call her to mind, put on snow shoes, and proceeded to her house, nearly buried in snow. With much difficulty he succeeded in entering, and then what a scene!

In one corner lay the lifeless, emaciated body of the mother. The suffering spirit had fled. By the side of their mother's corpse lay the three children, just gasping in the last stage of starvation.—They were immediately taken to the neighbor's house, and supplied with food. But in one, life was too far spent. It soon joined its mother. The others have recovered.

Not a mouthful of food was found in the house; the poor woman, faithful to the impulse of a mother's heart, had for days borne the keen pains of hunger, without tasting food, that she might give all her scanty store to her starving children. She lived to see them devour the last crumb, then laid herself down and yielded to the agonies of death by starvation.

The Bar and the Press.—The privileges of the bar are very extensive. It is only necessary to contrast the position of the feed advocate of a culprit with the unfed advocate of a public cause—the barrister with journalist—to appreciate the prodigious extent of the privileges of the bar. A barrister may toll for his client what he knows to be lies, and malignant lies, and use every artifice to give these lies the color of truth. It is enough for him if they are set down by an attorney no more responsible than himself. For his client, a barrister may insult one whom he knows in his secret heart to be an honest man, as a perjurer and a villain, and try to entrap him into some error that shall afford ground for the odious imputation. That these privileges are not suffered to lie idle, is proved by every day's experience, indeed; the barrister must exercise them if he would thrive in his profession; for as manners and moral character are no indispensable requisites at the bar, and as he who shall go furthest for a client will exteris paribus always be preferred in all but the very highest rank of the bar, we are sure to find the readiest perverters of the truth, the most unscrupulous bullies; whether of judges, juries or witnesses, the favorites.

The journalist, on the other hand; generally a man of better birth; education, manners and morals; than the majority of barristers, and therefore restrained by the feelings proper to this superiority—restrained, too, by the care for a good character, the loss of which, to him would be fatal—has none of the privileges with which the barrister is armed. So far from being allowed willfully to state falsehood (a privilege which we most joyfully renounce) he is always permitted to tell even the truth, and when imposed upon by misinformation offers no excuse.

A lousy Bachelor.—A young bachelor, in LaSalle, who proposed for the daughter of a wealthy planter in that parish, insisted, in his letter to her father, on receiving with her, as a dowry, a certain sugar plantation, which the latter owned; "for," added the gallant in his letter, "I should like to take my wife as I do my coffee—well sweetened."

Rail Road Accident.—An unfortunate accident occurred on the railroad, about ten miles from the city, on Sunday afternoon last. The particulars as they have been detailed to us, are these: A blind horse, upon the road, in attempting to get out of the way, fell across the track—the engineer seeing him making off, supposed that he would get clear of the locomotive, and not check its speed, and when the horse fell, the cars were so near him that it was impossible to stop them. The locomotive was precipitated down an embankment, killing a workman on the road, who had just got on for a ride, and badly scalding the engineer—a fireman saved himself by jumping on the opposite side, as the locomotive was going over. The passenger car was not at all injured. Indeed it is scarcely possible for the passenger cars to be thrown off the road—the foremost car is connected with the tender by a rod, which is sufficiently strong to draw the cars in a direct line, yet snaps easily when a contrary force is exerted. This has been demonstrated upon two or three occasions, when the locomotive has run off the track. Not a single passenger has yet been injured. The engineer, to whose carelessness this, as well as all previous accidents has been attributed, has, we learn, been discharged. The engineer now running on the road, is very careful, and has never yet met with an accident of any kind.—(Lexington (Ky.) Intelligencer.

FRESHETS.

The papers in various quarters speak of freshets, owing to the sudden approach of spring and the dissolution of the immense masses of snow, which for months past have covered the earth. The Philadelphia Gazette says that the freshet on the Delaware continues. The cars from Bordentown had to pass for miles through water two feet deep. Many of the wharves in Philadelphia were overflowed.

The National Intelligencer says there is a great flood of the Potomac, from which disastrous effects are apprehended. The Hartford Courant of Wednesday says the Connecticut river continued to rise during the whole of yesterday, at the rate of from one and a half to two inches an hour. The water covers all front street above Talcott, and last evening was on the first floor of Mr. Dean's temperance tavern, corner of Front and Morgan streets. Our merchants in the neighborhood of the river, have been put to inconvenience in removing their goods. On Commerce street and the lower part of State street, the water is on the first floor of a number of stores.

The Northampton (Mass.) Courier of Tuesday states that the Northampton, Hadley, and Hatfield meadows, with the Connecticut river, present almost an entire and unbroken expanse of water extending for several miles, up and down the river.

On this side of the river the water has overflowed in one direction, up as high as the Meadow Gate, in Pleasant street. Of course the houses below are surrounded by water. South street, near the Bridge, is three feet under water, and Blood Lane, is covered almost to the American Hotel.

The whole space, from the Mill river, to Fort Hill, almost as far West as South street, is under water. Many houses have been damaged in consequence of the water undermining the foundations, and the consequent caving in of the cellar walls.

From Hadley, says the Courier, we learn by the mail carrier, who arrived here this morning by water, that the river had overflowed the high bank at the head of West street which was under water—many of the cellars were filled, and several families had removed from their dwellings. The people were at work all last night endeavoring to stop the current of the river from pouring into the street—in removing those barns, and in clearing such houses as were most exposed to the flood.

Hockanum, and all that region, along the base of the mountain is under water. We learn also, that Cook's Hill road—a new and very expensive road on the bank of the river in South Hadley is almost totally destroyed.

The Boston mail arrived last evening in Pleasant street in a boat from Hockanum. And a boat may now pass the distance by water, without interruption, from Pleasant street in this village, to Crane's Tavern, at the corner of West and Russell streets in Hadley.

We learn from a gentleman who left Lowell this morning, that the Merrimack is falling, and all apprehensions of danger are now allayed in that quarter.

This Earth may yet be Destroyed.—“And what is this world,” says an eminent writer, “in the immensity which teems with them, and what are they who occupy it? The universe at large would suffer as little in its splendor and variety, by the destruction of our planet, as the verdure and sublime magnificence of a forest would suffer from the fall of a single leaf. The leaf quivers on the branch which supports it. It lies at the mercy of the slightest accident. A breath of wind tears it from its stem, and it lights on the stream of water, which passes underneath. In a moment of time, the life which we know by the microscope it teems with, is extinguished—and an occurrence so small in the eye of man, and on the scale of his observation, carries in it to the myriads which people this little leaf, an event as terrible and as decisive as the destruction of a world. Now on the grand scale of the universe, we, the occupiers of this ball, which performs its little rounds among the suns and the systems which astronomy has unfolded, may feel the same littleness and the same insecurity. We differ from the leaf only in this circumstance that it would require the operation of greater elements to destroy us. But these elements exist. The fire which rages within, may lift its devouring energy to the surface of our planet, and transform it to one wide wasting volcano. The sudden formation of electric matter in the bowels of the earth (and it lies within the agency of known substances to accomplish this) may explode it into fragments. The exhalation of noxious air from below may impart a virulence to the air around us. It may affect the delicate proportions of its ingredients, and the whole of animated nature wither and die under the malignity of a tainted atmosphere.—A blazing comet may cross this planet in its orbit, and realize all the terrors which superstition has conceived of it. We cannot anticipate, with precision the consequences of an event, which every astronomer must know to lie within the limits of chance and possibility. It may hurry our globe towards the sun, or drag it to the outer regions of the planetary system, or give it a new axis of revolution; and the effect, which I shall simply announce, without explaining it, would be to change the place of the ocean, and bring another mighty flood upon our islands and our continents.

“These are changes which may happen in a single instant of time, and against which nothing known in the present system of things, provides us with any security. They might not annihilate the earth, but they would unpeople it; and we who tread its surface with such firm and assured footsteps, are at the mercy of the elements; which, if let loose upon us by the hands of the Almighty, would spread solitude and death, over the dominions of the whole world.”

Three more Earthquakes had been felt at Jamaica up to the 14th inst. There had also been an extraordinary flux and reflux of the tides at Port Royal, and extensive and violent swells and continuous agitation of the waters even in the midst of a perfect calm. Two boats were upset in one of these strange convulsions, between Fort Augusta and Port Royal, when not a breath of wind disturbed the ocean's surface. Kingston harbor floating dead in the water, and emitting a strong putrescent odor. The Comet is charged not only with creating all this commotion in the water and among the fish, but also with occasioning “the peculiar mildness of the seasons.”

Murderous Attempt.—The wife of Mr. Shannon, (of the firm of Shannon and White, of the Washington Flour Mills), residing on ninth street, whilst seated at a window engaged in reading, last evening, was suddenly startled by the report of a pistol, followed by the immediate crashing of the glass within a foot of where she sat. After recovering from her fright, and calling her husband, they examined the room, and discovered a large pistol ball lodged in the wall opposite. Although the fragments of glass were scattered in every direction around Mrs. S. she providentially escaped all injury. At this window, and immediately under the spot where the ball entered, had, up to that day, been a stand, at which Mrs. S. always sat to sew or read, but she fortunately removed it to the place it then occupied, when the attempt was made upon her life. Had it been in its former position she would undoubtedly have been killed, so true was the aim of the assassin.

Mr. Shannon informs us that he had some difficulty with an individual in that neighborhood, and who he has every reason to believe is the author of this fiendish and murderous attack upon the life of Mrs. S. We trust that the monster will be ferreted out without delay, and brought to justice.—Where are our police officers?

Horrible Casualty.—A short time since, a son of William D. Green, of Columbus, Ark. about eight years old, went up a ladder to the top of a coal kiln, and fell into the aperture passing up from the bottom through the centre, which is always left for the purpose of ignition. The kiln was instantly torn down, and the poor little fellow was found standing erect on his feet, lifeless, and almost divested of the distinguishing lineament of a human being.

Singular Occurrence.—Romantic Remembrance in Middle Life.—On the 22nd of March, says the Boston Times, Mrs. Joseph Francis, of Glen's Falls, informed her husband that from that time forward she should occupy a separate couch and put a veto on all innocent familiarities which she had permitted for the last twenty one years. Now when a husband of twenty one years standing, hears such a remarkable announcement from the lips of a woman, who has ever been a faithful and complying wife, he does precisely what Mr. Joseph Francis did, looks at her with a gaze of astonishment, and asks, perhaps with the embellishment of an oath, what she can possibly mean? Thereupon the wife, or Mrs. Joseph Francis, to cite the case in point, rejoins that she doesn't think it right to live with him any longer, because they were married by a Catholic priest, and she could not understand a word of the marriage.

With some pleasant remark on the absurdity of supposing the marriage void, because the contracting parties have not received a classical education! Mr. Joseph Francis put on a pair of India rubbers, a pea jacket trimmed with fur, and a dog-skin cap which he had purchased for real leather at an exorbitant price, and, taking his wife under his arm, walked a distance of two miles through the snow to the residence of Mr. Wells, the Baptist clergyman of Glen's Falls. There the marriage ceremony was a second time performed.

The wife blushed, the husband, bride-groom looked tender and saluted her, the clergyman declined a fee, and the happy couple returned home—the wife being cured of all scruples with regard to the legality of “bed and board” and all the privileges and pleasures thereunto appertaining.

WERRY CHILDISH!

“My love you're werry childish!”—“What! You cruel thing to say so; And knowing what I suffers, too! It's always—every day so. If husbands only had to go Thro' half what their poor wives have; They wouldnt that I'd have 'em know—Such comfortable lives have!”

“Childish! fore we was married, if You only heard me sigh!” You used to fuss about as if You thought I was a dyin'; Oh, who would have a family! Let me go back to mother: Jane, the cologne;—there!—han! the child: Good gracious! there's the oth’r!”

“Well, but my love!”—“I’m not your love; But, darn it, only hear me!” “I won’t; but two years married, too!” You brute you, don’t come near me!” “I only said!”—“don’t talk!” I wail; I’m punished for my sins; I say you’re werry childish—yes! You comes it twice with the next!”

Pretty Good.—“I say, Monsieur Coddles, can you apply an impervious remnant from the dermoid exterior of the feminine quadruped, over the slight embrasure in my dilapidated under-standing, with such rhinoplastic accuracy, as to debar the excessive permeability of this sudden deliquescency?”

“Guess you’ve got into the wrong shop, sir,” exclaimed the dumbfounded registrar of sales. “May be you are a little out. The insane asylum is half a mile to the north, sir.”

“No harm, friend—I merely asked if you could patch this hole in my boot, so as to keep out the splosh!”

“Why, certainly, sir, and that a little the neatest. Thought you must have sprung a leak somewhere.”

That is from the crazy folks’ paper, the Asylum Journal.

Effects of Imagination.—A correspondent of the Salem Observer relates the following as a well authenticated anecdote, which took place not more than ten miles from Salem, in days when the spinning wheel and loom were more common than at present—of a good lady who was accustomed to ply her wheel on the long winter evenings, long after her husband had retired to rest from the labors of the day. Before retiring, she was in the habit of warming her side of the bed with the warming pan. In doing this she was often annoyed by his remonstrances against it, saying that she would burn him, though she had often assured him there was no danger of that. To cure him of this habit, she one night filled her pan with snow instead of coals; no sooner did the pain touch him than he sprang from the bed exclaiming, “now you’ve done it Mary! now you’ve burnt my leg to a blister!”

THE RIGHT KIND OF MILLERISM.—We’ve become, says an exchange paper, a convert to Millerism and don’t care who knows it. Travelling through a neighboring town the other day, we met a man staggering—no, not staggering either, for he was a teetotaler, and teetotalers never stagger—but walking under a well filled meal-bag. He was tired, and so were we; so we sat down to rest. A conversation ensued, in the course of which we learned that he had been badly used. In the first place his wife had been sick, and then his oldest boy had died, and last of all, his house had been burned to the ground but a few nights before.

Rather a hard case, said we. Yes, said the man, and I don’t know what I should have done if it hadn’t been for my neighbor A—. He paid my wife’s doctor’s bill, my boy’s funeral expenses, gave me a small cottage rent-free when my house burned down, and just filled this bag for me.

And who is this neighbor A—? inquired we. Who is he—why, I thought every body knew him. He’s the town miller, sir.

Filling up the poor man’s meal-bag, and paying his doctor’s bill, that must be Millerism. Pity there is not more of it in the world, said we.

The Right of Search.—The London Morning Herald winds up a long article on the President’s Message in relation to the Right of Search, by saying—“While, however, Mr. Tyler’s message will not raise his reputation either for candor or logical powers, it may, perhaps, be properly read as pointing out a way by which the practical difficulties of the question may be avoided; for certainly if the U. S. will not prevent the abuse of her flag, England can have no wish to do so; but if she do not, then England, undeterred by American ‘misconstruction of public law, and firm in suppressing the slave trade, will exercise the right of inquiry, as she has ever done since the British flag floated.”

Two Brothers meeting in a Desert.—A foreign correspondent, writing from Alexandria, Feb. 6, mentions a curious meeting which took place in the desert between Suez and Cairo. A Mr. Fawcett, who arrived here by the Oriental on his way to India, when at Cairo, heard that his brother was expected by that month’s steamer from Bombay. The two brothers had never set each other, the one being born in En land, whilst the elder brother was in India, where he had lived 32 years. As the younger, Mr. F. was proceeding across the desert on his donkey, he called out to the groups of travelers he met coming from Suez, whether Major Fawcett was amongst them, and towards midnight a voice answered to Mr. Fawcett’s call, and the two brothers shook hands in the dark; they both expressed a wish to see each other’s face; but no light was to be had, and they were obliged to part again, not having been together more than three or four minutes.

PREDICTIONS FOR 1843.

This year will be famous for a thousand wonderful things. From January to December the days will consist of twenty-four hours each, and there will be such a number of eclipses, that many wise people will be in the dark. There will be fogs in Maine, fires in Constantinople and the lack of brains in many a fool’s head. South America this year will not extend beyond Cape Horn; and the Northern Pole will be exactly in 90 degrees of latitude. Those who lose money will look sad and those who are in want of cash when they come to pay it. There will be long speeches in Congress, but for all that Lake Ontario will not be upset. All though there are many sober matrons who have long watched for the millennium, that now expect to see it boil like a pot, provided they hold on to the thread of life until April.

The celestial aspects indicate that political parties will not agree for some time to come; but whoever is President, water will run down hill, and ducks will waddle war the Scenevans or not; mortal wound will be apt to kill, and he that is sick with old age, will have a disease harder to cure than the mumps or chik cough. Quadrupeds this year will go upon four legs pretty generally, and cows horns will be crooked. The fate of lottery tickets will be dubious; but, whether there be as heretofore:

Cabbages this year, will be rather round than three cornered, and carrots will be decidedly red. Coals will be as black as ever, cats will love fish but hate to wet their feet and all on account of Halley’s comet.

The world this year will be turned upside down, but not in consequence of Miller’s predictions. The crop of hay will depend upon the weather; but whether it rains or not, there will be plenty of sand at Selkirk.

Whoever sells his house to buy moonshine will hardly get his money worth. Whoever runs to catch the rainbow, will get out of breath for his pains. For all that eastern lands may be had for the buying.

Locomotives and auctioneer’s tongues will run fast. There will be mortal war between the cats and rats, as well as between old men and roast turkeys. People will talk about the end of the world; but it is ten to one that the solar system will not run against the dog star between now and next April.

Sea serpents this year will be hard to catch and none but a conjurer will be able to get a quart into a pint bottle. Those who have wooden legs will suffer little when they freeze their toes. Wigs are expected to be fashionable among the bald but blind folks will have some difficulty in seeing.

Divers steam boats will blow up this year, yet it is hardly possible that any southern slawwanger will be able to set the Mississippi on fire. Apples will ripen about October, sooner or later, but that is all one, provided we have cider enough. Foxes will pay particular attention to poultry, there will be few old birds taken with chaff, and wild geese will not lay tame eggs.

But most of all there will prevail this year a horrid epidemic, worse than the cholera, small pox or plague, for which there will be no cure. The Italians call it poca doncro; the Germans, kieu gold; the French, fute d’argent; in this country it goes under various appellations but most commonly known by the name of empty pockets.

On a late Acquittal.—[MANCHESTER’S BY T. CAMPBELL. (From an English paper.)

Ye people of England! exult and be glad, For ye’re now at the will of the merciless mad, Why say ye that but three authorities reign—Crown, Commons, and Lords?—You omit the insane!

They’re a privileged class, whom no statute controls, And their murderous charter exists in their souls.

Do they wish to spill blood—they have only to play A few pranks—get asylum’d a month and a day—Then, high! to escape from the mad doctor’s keys.

And to pistol or stab whomsoever they please, Now, the dog has a human-like wit in creation! He resembles most nearly our own generation: Then if madmen for murder escape with impunity,

Why deny a poor dog the same noble immunity? So, if dog or man bite you, beware, being nettled, For crime is no crime—when the mind is unsettled.

YES OR NO.

When a man I ask a question,
I wish he'd answer Yes or No,
Nor stop to make some smooth evasion,
And only tell me—may be so.

I always doubt the friendly meaning
Of "well—perhaps—I do not know—"
When for an answer I am suing,
I'd rather hear the answer—No.

When a friend I wish to borrow
A little cash—to hear him say—
"I've none to-day—but on to-morrow—"
Is worse than if he told me nay.

Why all this need of plastering over,
What we in fact intend to show,
Why not at once, with much less labor,
Say frankly, Yes, my friend or No!

I from my soul despise all quibbling,
I'll use it not with friend or foe—
But when they ask, without dissembling,
I'll plainly answer, Yes, or No.

And when I ask that trembling question,
"Will you be mine, my dear Miss?"
Then may there be no hesitation,
To say distinctly—Yes Sir, Yes.

THE VALENTINE TEACHER.

"The manner in which the Waldenses and heretics disseminated their principles among the Catholic gentry, was by carrying with them a box of trinkets or articles of dress. Having entered the houses of the gentry and disposed of some of their goods, they cautiously intimated that they had commodities far more valuable than these—namely, jewels, which they would show if they could be protected from the Bible or Testament, and thereby many were deceived into heresy." See Reincarnated Sacchae's Book, A. D. 1258.

From the N. E. Review.
O lady fair, these silks of mine
Are beautiful and rare—
The richest web of the Indian loom.
Which beauty's self might wear;
And those pearls are pure as the snow fair,
With whose radiant light they vie,
I have brought them with me a weary way—
Will my gentle lady buy?

And the lady smiled on the worn old man,
Through the dark and clustering curls,
Which veiled her brow, as she bent to view
His silks and glittering pearls.
And she placed the price in the old man's hand.
And lightly turned away,
But she passed at the merchant's earnest call,
"My gentle lady stay!"

O lady fair, I have got a gem
Which a purer lustre brings,
Than the diamond flash of the jeweller's crown
On the lofty brow of kings;
A wonderful pearl of exceeding price,
Whose virtue shall not decay;
Whose light shall be as a spell to thee,
And a blessing on thy way!"

The lady glanced at the glittering steel,
Where her form of grace was seen,
Where her eyes shone clear, and her dark locks
Their glancing pearls between.
Bring forth thy pearl of exceeding worth,
Thou traveller gray and old,
And name the price of thy precious gem,
And my pages count thy gold!

The cloud went off from the pilgrim's face,
As a small and meagre bloom,
Unceasing with gold of diamond gem,
From his glowing robe he took;
Here, lady fair, is the pearl of price,
May it prove as such to thee!
Nay—keep thy gold—I ask it not,
For the word of God is free!"

The hoary traveler went his way,
But the girl he left in power,
Hath had its pure and perfect work
On that high-born maiden's mind;
And she hath turned from the pride of sin,
To the lowliness of truth,
And given her human heart to God,
In its beautiful hour of youth!

And she hath left the gray old hall,
Where an evil spirit held his power,
The country knights of her father's train,
And the maidens of her bower;
And she hath gone to the Valdeuse vale,
By lonely fief untrod,
Where the poor and needy of earth are rich
In the perfect love of God!

THE MORMON GIRL'S FOREBODING.

SCENE AT HAWN'S MILL.

CHAPTER II.

We have already stated that daily aggressions were being committed upon the citizens of Caldwell county. If the reader will here allow us to take him back a little previous to the date of the first chapter, we will see if this assertion had really a foundation. We will commence our observations at the time the church first made a settlement in Caldwell. After having been forced from Jackson county, without the shadow of law or justice, they received a temporary rest in Clay; but the seeds of envy and persecution being again sown, they hoped to find a more permanent rest in the county of Caldwell. They accordingly settled there and began to make improvements in that then wild and uncultivated region. The howling wilderness was converted into fruitful fields, and the desolate prairies began to smile under the industry of the husbandman. Houses were erected; farms began to spread out their broad limits in every direction; the lowing of the ox, and bleating of lambs, began to be heard for the low growl of the sullen bear and the fierce barking of the blood-thirsty wolf. In fine, an auspicious morning dawned upon their hopes, driving from the horizon all those lowering clouds of persecution, which, at intervals, had gathered over their heads, bursting upon them with irresistible fury, scattering the elements of desolation over the plains and carrying the conquest of extermination into the very seat of domestic quiet. Friends began to greet them every where and laud their untiring spirit of enterprise. This state of things continued for some time; but alas! the storm had only suspended its fury, and exhibited the promising bow of peace, for a season, that it might gather a new accession of strength and burst upon the innocent with more ponderous and deadly canopy. Its first blow was struck at the ballot-box!

At an election in Daviess, the Mormons had the hardhood (patriotism) to exercise their Constitutional right of the political franchise! This outrage (we speak ironically) upon the institutions of our beloved country, the very patriotic citizens of Daviess could not brook in silence. What they stand tamely by and see the Mormons tamper with the ballot-box? O no! they possessed too much philanthropy for this! They were the progeny of too noble a race! Sages of the Revolution! how completely are the illustrious deeds of thy immortal era, dimmed by the superlative lustre which the transactions of these, thy offsprings, now reflect upon an astonished world! Hadst thou but known that patriotism, like this, would have kindled its flame, at such a future period, thy sword might have rested in their scabbards—thy cannon, that uttered their voices for liberty and religious toleration, might have held their silence, and left the chains of the tyrant to be broken by a more intrepid, a more patriotic and illustrious progeny! Mark the noble Peniston employing all his eloquence, exhausting every energy, declaring the Mormon un-American, not only See him apply the exciting torch of mental exasperation, by appealing to the passions and prejudices of an ignorant populace! Most patriotic man—to you might be inscribed the honor of striking the first blow which contributed to the downfall of the great "Mormon Empire."

To you we readily accord all its honors and leave you surrounded with all the immunities it will award. Excited by his address, the populace rushed on in the infuriated attitude of a mob, and made a bloody attack upon the peaceable citizens who had assembled there for no other purpose than to cast their votes for candidates of their choice. They were beaten with clubs and pelted with stones, as did the fathers of the Revolution; and, though much inferior in numbers, they maintained their ground and gave in their votes. Where is the true patriot who will not sanction this act? Noble souls! on thy memory shall be bestowed the living mead of patriotism, which shall stand as a lasting trophy for thy descendants to imitate!

The mob now hurled the fire-brand of excitement through Daviess, Carroll, Saline and other counties; public meetings were held in every direction, and measures adopted for driving our citizens from their homes, that they might satiate their thirst for plunder and rapine. From all parts of the county companies of mob began to pour into Daviess, sweeping over the country in quest of booty, pillage and robbery. Houses began to be fired, reflecting their fitful blaze upon the solitude of midnight, as a witness to heaven of the wickedness of the despoiler. Legislators were found in their midst, and in some instances were their prominent leaders. Among this class we would recognize a Mr. Gilliam, who then held a seat in the Legislature. This celebrated individual hailed from the Platt country, and commanded a large company, not of Malitia, ordered out under the shadow of law, but of men who come out on their "own hook," painted like Indians and disguised with all kinds of fantastic odities, that they could carry on the work of plunder without being detected. This motley gang made it their business to plunder and frighten defenceless females, by menaces and demonic threatnings, some of whom fell victims to their sensual lusts. What an aspect of superiority must this important dignity assume in the halls of the Legislature of a State consolidated in the great confederacy of the Union. What a fit personage he must be for enacting laws consonant with the genius of this great Republic! If such men as this are to be allowed a voice in the deliberative councils of the Nation, we may bid adieu to the Siren songs of Liberty and the dulcet warblings of the Enchantress Peace!

We cannot trace the history of this transaction through all its various ramifications; but will name a few of the most appalling acts as they may occur to our mind. At one time we see De Witt, a small town in Carroll county, besieged for several days by the mob; its inhabitants shot, whenever an opportunity presented itself, or driven from their homes; at another time we see the brains of a citizen knocked out, with the butt of a gun, for no offence under heavens save that he was a Mormon; here we see a man literally cut to pieces, because he had the bravery to defend himself against the enemy when he was attacked; and in the thickets, we will find, ever and anon, during that persecution, the bodies of men who had the misfortune (good fortune) to be Latter-Day Saints! Virtue was despoiled—innocence insulted—the laws were trampled upon—Protection was wrested from the widow—orphans were deprived of protectors—and the blood of husbands and their wives, of children and parents, ran in one confluent stream upon the plain. Had the Mormons committed any act of outrage sufficient to warrant these marauders in a resort to crimes as heinous in their nature as these? No; they pursued peaceably their avocations until driven to arms for the protection of their homes, their property and their lives. They took shelter under the Constitution of their country which guarantees to every individual, to every sect and denomination—let their religious tenets be what they may—the right of worshipping Almighty God, unmolested, under their own vine and fig-tree. They appealed to the strong arm of civic power for protection; but protection was denied—that arm was paralyzed, and the judicial jurisprudence was inoperative! Their only object and desire was to obtain an honest living—to improve the country, by dint of enterprise—asked for the accomplishment of which they asked to be protected in their constitutional rights. The Governor and other functionaries of the law were importuned; but alas! patriotism had fled upon the wings of religious bigotry!

Mark the contrast. While one party sought an honest living, the other procured the plunder of the honest living. While one party sought to pursue their honest avocations, the other reduced their abodes to ashes, and drove them to the wilderness in despair, shelterless, wretched, and deplorable. While one party strove to maintain the laws, the other trampled upon them with impunity. Oh! America! thou once boasted asylum of the oppressed!—do deeds like these now blacken the escutcheon of your national dignity! Are your laws insufficient to protect your subjects? Senators! Arbiters of the Nation!—are you content to muffle yourselves in the robes of aristocratic greatness, and see your nationality thus dwindling away until nothing of its former greatness is left but the merest pigmy? Heroes of seventy-six!—if in the morn of the Revolution, when you planted in our infant colonies the ensign of freedom; if, when you first bore aloft the flag of a new Republic; if, when you struggled through the hardships of that perilous era, you could have seen, through the vista of time, your descendants let the spreading tree of Liberty become blighted and withered, by the recklessness of consequential demagogues, and its limbs, one by one, torn away, that it would yield no shelter from abuse;—we think you would have thrown down your swords in despair, exclaiming: "Where we would plant the perpetual tree of Liberty; where we would transmit, unimpaired, to all coming time, the unsullied fruit of freedom; England, let your despotism, your tyranny predominate!" This must have been their language, these their emotions, could they have foreseen such base disloyalty, acts so treasonable, and deeds so perfidious.

CHAPTER III.

'Twas early morning. The sun just began to peer its golden disk through the darkness of the Eastern horizon. The crowing of the Cock had not yet subsided. It was that hour when the world awakes from the unconscious pillow of dreams, and begins to think of rising to life and action. In that brief moment, the Monarch, the plebeian, the happy and the miserable, the superannuated and the active, the aged matron and the giddy maiden, the unfortunate upon his couch of straw and the aristocrat upon his bed of down, all alike, rush into the chequered vortex of life; some to beggary, some to affluence, some to gayety, and some to sadness. But sad was the fate that awaited the citizens of this sequestered place!

The sudden trampling of troops was heard on the opposite side of the stream, (Shoal Creek.) Troops, did we say? This is too soft a term to use. They better deserve the appellation of renegades, marauders, murderers, plunderers, burglars, destroyers of domestic happiness, and enemies to every thing that is great, ennobling, lofty and virtuous, in the human character. Like ravenous wolves, they prowled about, by day, and in the solitude of night, glutting themselves up on the blood of innocence, falling upon defenceless families, in their hours of conscious security, plundering them of their affections, burning their homes, and either murdering or driving them from their homes, into a desolate waste. Several instances could be cited, where they murdered men and then actually robbed them of their money, watches and clothes, and left their bodies to bleed upon the prairies. In fact, some of them had the audacity to boast that they were the perpetrators of these identical deeds. "O, shame, where is thy blush!" Across the creek were posted some two hundred men, armed with rifles, with all the malignant fury of demons depicted upon their countenances. The inhabitants, finding that their intentions were of a hostile nature, sent out a white flag, expecting, as a matter of course, that it would be regarded, by which means they hoped to effect a treaty of peace, and prevent themselves and families from being butchered. But this was a delusive hope. Instead of recognizing it according to the dictates of humanity, they treated it with contempt, and poured upon it a deadly volley of balls! How would the jurisprudence of international law look upon this act of perfidy and dishonor? If a Truce is held sacred and inviolable by belligerent Nations, when warring for national conquest and an extension of their dominions, how much more sacred should it be held in the turmoil of a civil commotion, when individuals, belonging to the same Government, governed by the same laws, owing allegiance to the same flag, the progeny of the same ancestry, and rocked together in the same great cradle of national independence, are the subjects of contention! Even barbarous nations, unjest with the dawn of civilization, strangers to that broad light of science which now scatters its lustre over all civilized Christendom, respect and reverence this token of peace. The savage Indian, whose highest ambition is his wig-wam and gun, grovelling in a state of mental degradation, bows with respectful obedience to this ratifying emblem. Then, O, Missouri! how far below the dignity of barbarism do your sons sink in the scale of humanity and the laws of honor!

They were strangers to the high-toned principles it inspires! Plunder was the great impetus that urged them on, and regulated their plans; and, blind to every thing well-ordered and humane, they broke down every restraining barrier, and disregarded every principle of integrity, to satisfy their hellish appetites. No quarters were shown; but the work of extermination commenced. The inhabitants, attacked by such sudden surprise, and superior force, fled to a neighboring blacksmith-shop, that its walls might protect them from the balls that fell in showers around them, many of them falling dead as they ran. The enemy not only attacked the shop, but carried the work of slaughter into the private dwellings! O, horrid butchery! O, scene of blood!—how gladly would we avert the task of chronicling thy deeds, could we but do so and discharge a duty we owe to the cause of innocence! They knew no discrimination; women as well as men, children as well as parents, fell martyrs before the hot Moloch of religious bigotry, and poured out their blood upon the diabolical shrine of avarice and superstition! Those who escaped their fury, did so by secretly fleeing to the wilderness. O, you mothers, who, in that dread day, sought refuge with your children, in the solitude of a lonely wood! O, you fathers, who expired for your religion, as it were, in the very bosom of your families, yet blessed with no kind office of the sympathetic wife!—How ought patriots to yearn over your fate, and the arm justice raise in mighty majesty to redress your wrongs! Those who were driven into the shop were murdered by the mob, firing through the interstices between the logs. They heeded no importunities, but mingled furiously in the scene of blood. Listen, patriots, to the cries of a little boy, who sought refuge behind the bellows. Hear him cry, on being discovered: "SPARE ME! I AM AN AMERICAN BOY!"

Lovers of your country! boasters of patriotism!—can you entertain any fellowship for men who will not heed an appeal like this? With what potency would it have fallen upon the ears of men, however enraged, however incensed by passion, who nursed the least spark of patriotism in their bosoms! Imagine an appeal like this coming from the lips of a mere boy, trembling before the poised piece which soon after terminated his existence! The monster who committed this black atrocity, was held in such high estimation by the mob, that in the abundance of their liberality, they furnished him with funds to enter forty acres of land! Such bravery, such unrivalled prowess, as this, should undoubtedly be rewarded!

In the midst of that direful conflict, stood one form, conspicuous in its dignity, towering in reverend majesty above the heaps of dying bodies around him. O, venerated hairs! O, wrinkled visage of that old man!—with what power did they speak, in a scene like that, of the battles of the Revolution! Agility had departed from his feet, and strength from his hands; but his body stood erect, in dignity and pride, a monument of patriotism, as if to rebuke the storm which now rolled on its work of slaughter and expiration! Notwithstanding the emotions of seventy-six, which his age, his dignity, and the pleadings of his eloquent tongue inspired, he felt a martyr for the cause of truth, and poured out his blood to satisfy the malignity of a heartless foe! O, you sainted sage!—why did an All-Wise Providence suffer you to pass through so many hard fought battles, with your life, to fall at last by the ruthless hands of your countrymen! Shades of the venerated Washington!—you sleep; no more to animate your countrymen with the emotions of patriotism, save by your immortal memory; but could your spirit descend from its celestial eminence, and view this transaction, this companion of thine, who, breasted, with thee, the formidable panoply of tyrants, thus fall under the damning wheel of infatuation, how would you weep over the degeneracy of the great American family! O, perfidy! O, requent sons of noble sires!—why have you departed from the councils of an illustrious ancestry, and painted the crouching and deformed visage of Treason upon your flag! O, my country! where is your dignity? O, Missouri! where is the efficacy of the blood of the Revolution? You heed not the importunities of your countrymen; your gubernatorial office is transformed into an instrument of "EXTORTION;"—still political demagogues, of other States, yet deign to "shake your blood stained hand!"

Dark and bloody ages of antiquity! when the mitred edicts of priests and their pontifical Emperors, became law for the demise of reformers upon the damning car of the Inquisition!—your startling deeds of crime—humorous as they may be—appealing to humanity as might have been their consequences—can here find a parallel of equal barbarity! Look at the consequences resulting from this malignant spirit of moral turpitude. Witness thousands of men, women and children, forced from their homes and from the state, to wander the length and breadth of the land, as paupers and outcasts, infatuated Governor. Plundered of provisions, robbed of property, reduced, many of them, to a state of apparent nakedness, seek them fleeing from the limits of a State whose star still remains upon the escutcheon of the National compact, encountering the scoffs and indignities of a degenerate people as they passed, meeting with no hospitable shelter to shield them from the peltings of winter, and staining the frozen ground with the prints of their bleeding feet! Reader, these are not the mere figments of a fanciful imagination, of chimeras of a fanciful mind;—but hundreds of men who felt that persecution—women who experienced the desecrating spirit of their villainy—children who trembled under the force of their hellish intimidations—can attest their truth, and the blood of the martyred declare them to the courts of a celestial tribunal!—What more can we say? The force of language is insufficient, and the powers of intellect are too feeble, to do justice to a subject so mentally absorbing. We shrink from the scene overwhelmed with sadness and despair!

During all that day, the females were compelled, by prudence, to remain in the woods, hiding themselves in the thickets and caves, nor dare they approach their homes until gloomy night had veiled the scene of slaughter with the dark mantle of her obscurity. The wounded husbands, who had been left for dead, remained alone through the day, to wretch in the torment of their agony. O, how dear to them would have been the sympathies of a wife! But not till night dare they issue from their secluded retreats, and then they pronounced the names of their husbands and children in whispers of her affliction! O, what a sudden transition from anticipated happiness, to stern reality's cold despair!

Kind reader, in that sad hour, where can you imagine might have been found the young, the lovely, the beautiful, the intellectual, but now sorrow-stricken Mary! On the wings of the night she floated the faint echo of a careful step, and, ever and anon, a feeble voice was heard to articulate the name of Edward! That step, that voice was Mary's! At length her vigil eye rested upon a male form which was stretched upon the damp earth, in lifeless solemnity. In a moment more her slender form was bending over it in moody silence. She brushed the dew from his icy temples—she examined—no throbs of that youthful blood, which, the evening before, leaped through his veins and warmed that now cold body, was to be felt. The moon shed a fitful ray of light over him, disclosing the compressed, motionless lips, and marble countenance of that pallid form. His hand was in hers—she felt a ring, the pledge of her affection! O, what a sudden transition from anticipated happiness, to stern reality's cold despair!

How did you fare, Mary, in the turmoil of that joyless day? Did your fragile form escape unharmed amid the showering balls of that relentless and formidable foe? No, reader, this was not the happy lot of this lovely girl! The moonlight radiance, dim and solemn in its lustre, disclosed the bandage upon that tiny hand, which had been shattered by a ball as she attempted to make her fight! With what eloquent potency would that hand, raised to heaven, in all the dignity of maiden innocence, plead in behalf of sainted martyrs and virtue despoiled!

O, Mary! in that sad hour, that moment of utter desolation, with Edward stretched before thee in the arms of death, how sadly didst thou feel the perfect consummation of all the dark forebodings of the previous night!

THE MOBBERS OF MISSOURI.

BY A LAWYER IN SEAGAL.
Come gentlemen and ladies too,
Who love your country's glory,
Hark! if you've nothing else to do,
While I relate a story:
And hark what's done, like days of old,
By mortals in their fury:
For 'tis not often you behold,
Such mobbers as Missouri!
Oh Missouri! the mobbers of Missouri!
The mobbers of Missouri!

A hundred years behind the age,
If you allow for feelings,
They stand upon our nation's page,
A savage set of beings,
Who always seek for blood and strife,
Despising judge or jury,
And towards life they arm for life,
As mobbers of Missouri!
Oh Missouri! the mobbers of Missouri!
The mobbers of Missouri!

'Twas many thousand pounds, at hand,
They mobbed from the printer,
And drove the church from off their land,
To perish in the winter.
And to the reverend I. McCoy
Was one among that legion,
Who took his gun up to destroy—
The cause of rural religion.
Oh Missouri! the mobbers of Missouri!
The mobbers of Missouri!

A few at first, to try their faith,
They scour'd with tar and feathers,
And after whilst almost to death,
Not asking whys or wherefores;
They tore down houses, pillaged goods,
And seem'd all power defying,
While women fled in to the woods,
With children round them crying—
Oh Missouri! the mobbers of Missouri!
The mobbers of Missouri!

But once to show their father's blood,
And save their valor apples,
And gave the mob a sample;
And when so near they heard them swear,
They thought 'twas time to still them,
And it would have made a soldier stare,
To see the people quell them.
Oh Missouri! the mobbers of Missouri!
The mobbers of Missouri!

Go spread the news from sea to sea,
Let truth to all be given,
In eighteen hundred thirty-three,
The church of Christ was driven:
Away from houses, homes and lands,
To this, their realm of freedom,
Because a ruthless mob commands,
As priests and lawyers lead them.
Oh Missouri! the Mobbers of Missouri!
The mobbers of Missouri!

Agricultural.

Manure for Gardens.—We have tried a variety of kinds of manure for a garden, and these kinds in a variety of forms; and, as far as our experience warrants an assertion in favor of any particular kind, we must give a decided preference to swamp mud, or muck. One argument in its favor is, that it seldom produces weeds. Another, that it contains so much vegetable matter in a decomposable state that it is easily brought to operate as the food of plants. It also, from the slowness of its decay, continues its effect longer than most of our manures. Its cheapness also commends it, for all its costs is the mere getting it from the pond hole, which will be sure to fill its treasury before a new draft is necessary. In order to have it prime, it should be placed in a pile for a few days, and ashes or lime mixed with it, and subjected to workings, until the lumps are all reduced; and the two simples thoroughly compounded. It may then be put (half a shovel full will answer) in the hill of the melons, cucumbers, and squashes. For radishes, and the like, we use it as a top dressing.

Genesee Farmer.
New method of growing Asparagus.—The editor of the Horticultural Magazine, recommends a trial of the following method of growing asparagus, which is practiced at Nice, and of which a high account is given in the London Gardener's Chronicle. Take a quart wine bottle, invert it over the head of the stalk of asparagus just rising from the ground, and secure it by three sticks, so that it cannot be knocked over. If left in this state, the asparagus will grow up into the interior of the bottle, and being stimulated by the unusual moisture it is then exposed to, will speedily fill it. As soon as this has taken place, the bottle must be broken, and the asparagus removed, when it will be found to have formed a thick head of tender delicate shoots, all eatable, and as compact as cauliflower.

Peach Worm.—A neighbor informs me that the application of tar to the roots of peach trees, effectually excludes the worm. The earth is removed for a few inches down, and the tar applied. It is not intended of course to destroy the worm, but to prevent its entrance in trees yet unaffected. —Cultivator.

Value of Plaster and Ashes.—Mr. Enoch Hoyt, a farmer upon Horse Hill, in this town, informs us that in the summer of 1841, four acres of pasture land upon his farm were covered with a layer of plaster, and two by one of his neighbors. Both parts were planted with manure. At the time of planting his own, a very small quantity of ground-plaster was thrown in each hill; and after planting, less than a gill of ashes was thrown upon the hill, as the potatoes came out of the ground. His neighbor made use of neither plaster nor ashes. In all other respects the two parts were treated alike. In the course of the season, the difference in the potato tops was very plain, upon opposite high ground, more than half a mile distant. Two rows of each part, side by side, were dug at the same time; when the hills where the plaster and ashes were used, produced two bushels, for one of the ground where neither was used.—Hills Visitor.

Planting and Ashing.—In order to insure a rapid growth to the young plants, prepare a compost of ashes and plaster, in the proportion of five bushels of the former to one of the latter, and give to each hill of corn, just as the plant comes up, a gill of mixture. Its increase of yield will pay you liberally for your trouble and expense. And if, in addition to this, you were to sow a bushel of Plaster per acre broadcast over your field, you would be most bountifully rewarded for the labor and cost.

Use of Lime.—The Farmers' Advocate states that lime mixed with a compost of weeds, vegetable rubbish, &c. breaks them up, and moreover, destroys the power of germination in the seed—thus converting noxious matter into valuable manure.

It always destroys worms, slugs, grubs and in some cases, wire worms.

Wounds in trees.—Melt a pound of tar with four ounces of tallow, add half an ounce of saltpetre, stir the whole together. A coat of this composition, applied to a cut or bruise, will prevent decay, and cause the wound to heal. Before applying it, all unsound timber should be cleared away.—Hartford Cour.

Gooseberries are much less apt to mildew when trained so as to admit the air freely to circulate among the branches; the fruit too will be finer, if there be but one stalk in a hill, instead of a great cluster, as we often see. Shopkeepers, from the wash tub sprinkled over them, for three or four weeks in succession, before blossoming, it is said, are a great preservative and will hardly fail to ensure fine, fair, and large berries.

Onions planted in the same hill with vines, will protect the latter from the depredations of the striped bug.

The Wheat Prospect.—From all parts of the region round about here we are assured that the prospect of a wheat crop, the coming season is gloomy in the extreme. Some fields in which the wheat was sown among corn, and the stalks left standing, may turn out an average yield; but on all other ground probably not a quarter crop will be had. Some farmers are harvesting spring wheat upon their blasted and barren fields, and some others are putting them in oats and corn. If other portions of the wheat-growing states have suffered any thing like northern Illinois—and from all we can hear from the south, the failure there has been equally great—there must be a scarcity of this important article next fall, and the price must consequently be in proportion.—Peoria Register.

HERD GRASS.—A HINT TO WESTERN FARMERS.—Our western agriculturists grow too much corn and wheat, and too little herd grass seed for market. Our remarks are based upon the facts, that wheat is worth only 25 cents a bushel in the interior of Indiana and Illinois, and that many bushels of corn are sent from the latter State to Boston, Mass., by the way of New Orleans, and sold at 50 a 55 cents a bushel. Herd grass could be sent to the same market, at the same, if not at a less price per bushel, and is worth 32, 50, or five times the value of corn. When it is recollected that a bushel of western corn weighs 56 lbs., it must be apparent that the cost of its transportation from western Illinois to New York and Boston will leave but a miserable pittance to the cultivator of this great staple.

The corn growers of the state of Delaware have realized great advantages from the kiln-drying of corn and meal for exportation. The adoption of this practice in the rich corn growing districts at the west could not fail of being eminently useful.

But while our western farmers and merchants ought to improve every advantage that will render their crops more valuable, and available, they should not fail to keep the Atlantic cities well supplied with grass seed.—Buff. Com. Adv.

Should there be any saints who employ laborers, and require them to work more than ten hours, lack two virtues of the gospel:—mercy and humanity.

HOME MANUFACTURE.

If there is any one subject that is of more importance to the interest and prosperity of the citizens of Nauvoo, it is that of home manufacture; and we have frequently been surprised that so little attention has been paid to it. Having mechanics from the best manufacturing districts, both of this country and England, that are acquainted with every business, both theoretically and practically in all its minutiae—men that have followed their different trades for a livelihood all their days; we again repeat it, we are surprised that men of this description, possessing the talent, the genius and the practical knowledge of manufactures, which they do, have not given their attention more to this subject, in which their own individual prosperity and that of the community of this region of country, are so deeply interested.

We are not alone in our opinions, in relation to this subject; these opinions, are only the re-echo of what we have heard repeated times without number. Our mechanics have been complaining of it; our merchants have been talking about it, and all our neighbors have been wondering why we have paid no more attention to manufactures.

Agriculture has made rapid strides; men have been on the full stretch, and have exerted all their powers for the advancement of agriculture, which is indeed laudable, since it furnishes us with the "staff of life." We never saw in any place so great a revolution, and so much improvement in agricultural pursuits in so short a time, as we have witnessed in Nauvoo and its vicinity. The wilderness has indeed become like "a fruitful field, and the desert has blossomed as the rose," nor have we any fault to find with many other branches of business, here are our carpenters, brick-layers and masons, shoemakers, tanners and curriers, twinespinners, millers, glove, and strawbonnet makers, and many other branches of business and we might add the printers: are doing all they can to build up this place in doing which their own undivided interest and prosperity are indispensably involved; they have done much in the short time they have been here for the building up of this place; and Nauvoo at the present time is a striking monument of this fact; on the pedestal of which is written, as with a sunbeam, that the inhabitants of Nauvoo, are the most industrious, persevering, orderly, indefatigable, and enterprising of any in the west.

We do not mean to say that the saints are idle, by no means. The difficulty is that they are not employed at what they ought to be. Men that have been accustomed to manufacturing cotton goods are making ditches on the prairie, woolen manufacturers are carrying the hod, and working at day labor, and silk weavers are turning farmers, and potters have got metamorphosed into builders and wood choppers. We applaud them for the course they have taken, under existing circumstances; but think that they would look much better, be more comfortable, and be more usefully and profitably employed at their own several trades than in following their present occupations.

The prosperity of this place depends in a great measure upon the encouragement of home manufacture. We propose showing wherein; and what advantage would occur from several different branches that might be entered into here; in the mean time we would ask of the agricultural and manufacturing society, or of its officers, or those concerned, why is it that the building for the pottery is not progressing this spring? A great deal of money has already been expended in that building; crockery ware is as much needed here as in any other place; we have as good potters as can be found elsewhere, and why is it when money is so scarce that we have to send it away for articles that we can make ourselves? Will some of those concerned answer these questions?

We would call the attention of our citizens to a notice that is placed in several parts of our city relative to taxes, calling upon the inhabitants of this place that own property to give in a list of it for valuation. We would advise our friends to do so, and thus fulfill the law, and save trouble, we would at the same time state that in many parts of this city our county assessors have assessed property double to that of our city assessors; this may be a subject for investigation hereafter; in the meantime we would advise our citizens to take in lists of their taxable property. We append the following extract from the revenue laws, for their information:—

Sec. 8. If any person or corporation, owning taxable property in such county, shall fail to attend in person, or by his agent, and give an amount of his taxable property at the time and place appointed for that purpose, the assessor in such case, shall ascertain, by the best means in his power, the taxable property belonging to such person or corporation, and the value thereof; the assessor shall add six per cent on the amount of such tax to the same, to be collected for the use of the assessor, to compensate him for his extra trouble, of assessing said property; and if any person when called upon at his residence by the assessor, shall refuse to furnish such list, or shall at any time furnish a fraudulent list of his property, the assessor shall in like manner, ascertain his property, and the value thereof, and as a penalty for such refusal or fraud, he shall assess such property at double its value.

The assessor will attend at the office of Esquire Hibbee in Commerce precinct on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, the 29, 30, and 31st of May, and on Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, Monday and Tuesday the 6, 7, 8, 9, 12, and 13th days of June in Nauvoo precinct.

Upwards of one hundred and fifty emigrants arrived at this place, this morning, May 31st, per steamer Amaranth, from England.

Stay Law.—The following is an extract from the N. O. Picayune:

"What do they mean by the 'Stay Law,' the papers are talking about so much?" said a young married lady to her better half one day. "It is a law against wearing corsets, my dear." "Well they may pass it and re-pass it, as much as they please, but I'll never give up mine. What business have the legislators to meddle with such affairs, I should like to know?"

The recent act for the support of the Charity Hospital of New Orleans levies the following taxes, for the use of that institution, on persons arriving there from abroad.

"On each and every cabin passenger from foreign ports, $3.

"On each and every steerage passenger from foreign ports, $2.

"On each and every cabin passenger from the U. S. by sea, $1.

"On each and every steerage passenger from the United States by sea, 50 cents.

"And from each and every cabin passenger by steamboats from any State other than the State of Louisiana, $1.

"And from each and every deck passenger by steamboat from any State other than the State of Louisiana, 50 cents."

The act makes it the duty of all masters of vessels and steamboats arriving at New Orleans to collect the tax and pay it over, to the collector appointed by the hospital, and authorizes the detention and sale by the master of the baggage of any passenger who may refuse to pay the tax; it also authorizes the collector of the hospital to demand the register or record of passengers, and the master who may refuse to comply with the demand is made liable to a penalty of fifty dollars. Vessels and steamboats running exclusively within the limits of Louisiana are exempt from the provision of the law.—Louisville Jour.

Operatives in the British Isles Compared with those in America, &c.—In the British House of Commons on the 6th April, Mr. C. Buller made a speech, upon introducing his colonization scheme, from which we extract the following passages of very great interest. He said:

"The restraints in different trades, the continued sufferings of so large a class of hand-loom weavers, and, above all, the noble lord, the member for Dorsetshire of the state of the people, showed how fearful the pressure of non-employment was. Let them look to the accounts which had been given of the lodgings of the people in the reports laid before the house—let them look to the unwholesomeness of their employments—let them look to the accounts which had been laid before them last year of the people who worked the greater part of their lives in the darkness of coal pits, where men women and children were huddled together, in a state of moral degradation little above the condition of the brute creation. Let them look also to the accounts of the shirt-makers, who made a dozen shirts for 10d. or let them look to the accounts of the 15,000 milliners in the metropolis, who were now working for the scantiest wages, in the most unwholesome and close rooms, for 12 or 14 hours a day, and who were dying by scores of consumption, or daily becoming incurably blind. All these were the necessary consequences of the one great fact, that every year that rolled over our heads we had added 300,000 persons to the previous population of the country; and unless they could find some employment for these additional mouths, extreme distress must prevail. As for Ireland, the case was still worse there. They might hear of hundreds and thousands dying in that country of want. And who could wonder at it when they knew, from the most authentic statistics, that there were always in that country more than 2,000,000 of people who, for thirty weeks of the year, were suffering more or less from want of employment. It was this constant supply of population up to the brink that was the cause of all the evils of their condition. When the ordinary condition of the country was that there was not sufficient employment for the population, how fearful must be the distress that ensued when the population increased in a much greater ratio than employment? How terrible moreover was it, when, in this state of things there was a sudden defalcation in the ordinary sources of employment? Let them look, for instance, to the distress in the Highlands, which had been brought before them by the hon. member for Inverness-shire and which had been created by the substitution of barilla for kelp in the manufactures; or let them take the cases of the local distress occasioned by the removal of the silk manufacture from Spitalfields, or the woollen manufacture from the west to the north of England.

Let them remember also what misery was caused in particular trades when any change of fashion deprived parties of the demand for the particular articles which they manufactured. Or when great bodies of workmen were thrown out of employment by any improvement in machinery, which, although it was beneficial to the great mass of the community, must inflict great suffering upon many deserving men. These things did not occur in the United States. Many gentlemen would smile when he talked of the factory girls of Lowell with their joint-stock piano forte and their circulating library, but that man must be hard-hearted indeed who would not feel that there was something very different when their condition was contrasted with that of our poor operatives. If the Lowell factories were broken up to-morrow, there was not one of the girls who would not obtain fresh employment, or go back to those farm-houses, as domestic laborers, from which they had been spared with reluctance. In this country they would go back to the parishes or to their families, to bring both their families and themselves on the parish. You could only account for this by recollecting the different condition of our countries—in the one country capital and labor were over supplied, in the other there was always a sufficiency of employment for them. In America, when persons were thrown out of employment, fresh employment was always open, here they only beat down existing wages and profits. These considerations would enable us to account for some of the most perplexing phenomena of our present condition—how it was that we heard a cry of distress, whilst we saw evidence of great and growing prosperity—how it was that the country presented the contrast of the greatest luxury on one side, and the greatest suffering on the other—how we appeared both the neediest and the richest people in Europe. He would not be understood to represent the present distress of the people as being now greater than it ever was; because, taking our external condition during a period of ten years, he was ready to admit that we were better off in most respects than we then were. But then this assertion of the general improvement of the people must be qualified by the admission that there was, at the present moment, a greater mass of extreme misery than ever. He did not believe that there was ever such misery as existed in the cellars and garrets at Liverpool or Glasgow, or even in this metropolis; and he was sure that crime was never so habitual and gross. This was the truth, he had a greater amount of comfort and enjoyment, but also a greater extreme of misery; the exceedingly suffering class was greater than it ever was before.

Small Dogs.—Saturday passing down Royal street, we saw a Spaniard with a basket of the smallest kind of live dogs. These little creatures were not larger than kittens, and as white as snow. Their ears were decorated with ribbons, and switching their tails about, they growled in a plaintive key, as much as to say "we are none of your common dogs."

These little dogs were very tame, and as they passed, she lifted her hands with the exclamation—

"Ah, Mon Dieu! what beautiful little dogs! Look at rare little eyes—rare little legs, and oh! rare little tails, so fine as floss silk! I must buy one—I will have him for my pet."

Taking a magnificent and embroidered purse out of her reticule, she paid the dog fancier ten dollars in gold for one of them, and kissing it over and over, she went on her way rejoicing.

A loafer of the Billy White tribe stood on the corner, and raising his hands up solemnly, he said:

"Well, I'm blowed if I don't b'lieve dogs are worth more than human men. After this, I'll rent myself out as a Daguerrotype likeness of the want of a house of refuge. Ten dollars for a dog, and such a dog! Why it freezes my blood to think on't!"

A beautiful girl came by next, and seeing the little creatures frisking about, she stopped to examine them. At last she selected one and paid the money for it, but no sooner had she taken it in her arms than it jumped down again and ran to its master. She then tried to coax it after the following manner:

"Come Putsey, zittle doggy woggy—come to its mistress, and it shall have a piece of pink ribbon around its neck. Come, zittle cherub doggy! Come—come—ah! dat's a paisy little thing!" So saying, she took her purchase in her arms, and walked quietly up the street.

The loafer looked after her retreating form for some moments in utter astonishment. Well! said he, I'd like to swap myself off for one of them there pups. They feed 'em out of china cups and saucers, and gives 'em milk sweetened with loaf sugar, afore they goes to bed at night. I have heard that some of the ladies down town employs barbers, on purpose to curl their dogs' wool, but that's a egg-saggeration, I spect. Well there's one comfort—dogs won't be better than other folks after next April.—Ex. Paper.

Fox River Feeder.—The discovery of the practicability of feeding the Illinois and Michigan canal with the water of the Fox river, introduced upon the raised level or higher portion of the canal, is exciting no little attention, and is, we think, to be regarded as an event calculated materially to add to the already sanguine anticipations of the friends of that great work. Until recently, it was thought totally impracticable to introduce the water of the Fox River into the canal on the raised level, mainly, we believe, from the deep cutting which it was supposed would be requisite. A faithful survey has disclosed the gratifying fact that the water of the Fox at the foot of the dam at Aurora is actually forty-five feet above the surface of the water in the raised level of the canal. The route proposed for the contemplated feeder or side canal, for it would be such in fact, is this. Commencing at the foot of the dam at Aurora, ad-crossing thence to Plainfield by way of Oswego. At Plainfield, cross and take in the Dupage, which itself is there thirty feet above the level of the water in the raised level of the canal. From the Dupage, the feeder continued would strike the canal about three miles this side of Lockport, and of course on the high level. The distance between this point on the Illinois and Michigan canal and the dam at Aurora, would be, by way of the contemplated feeder, less than 27 miles. There would be three or four locks—namely at Plainfield, to enable boats to drop into the Dupage; the others between the Dupage and the point of termination near Lockport. The feeder could be comparatively easily constructed, since the deepest cutting would be only fourteen feet, and one embankment only, for the greater part of the distance, would be necessary. This would present the additional advantage of a tow path nearly on one and the same side throughout the whole line.

There are no less than three arguments to be urged in favor of the construction of this Fox river feeder in lieu of that by which it was proposed to introduce the waters of the Kankakee &c. All and each of them, it seems to us, is absolutely conclusive, needing but to be stated to receive immediate assent. The estimated expense of taking water from the Kankakee and Calumet is about $300,000. The proposed Fox river feeder will cost only $200,000. A saving would thus be effected of $100,000. The great extent of country which would be tributary to the feeder—a country promising to be the most populous portion of the state, would obviously render the feeder, used as a canal, a source of great revenue. Little or none could be derived from the Kankakee feeder. The proposed feeder would cross a large quantity of land owned by the state, selected last summer under the Distribution Law. The bare increase in the value of these lands would, in all probability pay for the work three or four times over. As regards Chicago, in particular, the construction of the feeder would be of immense importance. It would be in reality a canal, and one approaching in importance to that of the main line or trunk itself, since it would open to us an almost direct and an easy communication with a vast extent of country, in fertility unrivalled.

The survey was made by Mr. Hanchett, and has met the approbation of Mr. Gooding. These gentlemen have conjointly reported on the subject to Messrs. Oakley and Ryan, and the matter cannot, we think, fail to have a most favorable bearing upon the pending negotiations.

We shall take occasion in a day or two to consider this matter, particularly in connection with the Rock river country. Should Rock river prove to be in the proper level, nothing could be more desirable than an extension of the feeder in that direction.—Chicago Express.

A GRAND WORK PROJECTED.—The N. Y. Express says it is proposed by the Harper, if 300 subscribers can be obtained at $100 each, to publish in full size the larger drawings which Mr. Catherwood has made of the ruins of Central America. Miniature copies of these drawings are published in Mr. Stephens' new book; but this proposal goes to publishing in larger size the details of these drawings, with descriptions, so that the reader can see and perceive what they in reality are. The Harpers are not willing to undertake so great a work without some prospect of remuneration, and they ask, therefore, for a subscription. The work, if undertaken, will be done, we presume in the first style, somewhat in the character of the drawings of the French savans, who accompanied Bonaparte in his Egyptian expedition.

The Boston Mail states, on the authority of an aged farmer in Worcester county, that in the year of 1785, the snow held on to the depth of four feet until the 20th April. It then suddenly thawed off, and summer came on apace; and no year, either before or since, within his memory, has equalled that one for productiveness.

FATAL RAIL ROAD ACCIDENT.—This morning, at 11 o'clock, as the passenger train on the Charlestown Branch Rail Road were passing over the bridge in front of the State Prison, going on, owing to the looseness of a rail, the engine was thrown off the track and precipitated, together with the car and tender, into the mud and water below—a distance of about fifteen feet.

There were from 15 to 20 passengers in the car, including several ladies, of which number the following were injured: Mr. Samuel H. Brown, Pawich, killed; Miss Rebecca Hill, West Cambridge, collar broken, and ankle fractured; Mr. Taylor, engineer, Worcester, slightly injured; J. M. Glidden, Eben Barker, and J. M. Harris, slightly injured; D. Chambers, conductor, badly injured, back broken.

There were several other persons injured, more or less; but in the confusion their names could not be ascertained. Many escaped as by a miracle. The chain broke, and the baggage car was prevented from going over, which fortunately saved many who would otherwise have been instantly killed. It was also fortunate that the tide was low, which prevented them from being drowned.

The body of Mr. Brown was taken to the State Prison. Every exertion was made to relieve the wounded by those who were near and saw the catastrophe. It is a miracle that the whole were not instantly killed. The above particulars were gathered from Mr. Smith, of the Exchange, who went over, and saw all that he could obtain. The locomotive lies deeply buried in the mud—the tender and car a complete wreck.

We also understand that a man named Hill, employed on the cars, is missing, and it is feared that he is buried beneath the engine.—Daily Adc.

Powerful Magnet.—A lecturer was dilating upon the powers of the magnet, defying any one to show or name anything surpassing its powers, when a man mounted the stand and told him that woman was the magnet of magnets; for, said he, the loadstone could attract a piece of iron a foot or two, there is a young woman who used to attract him thirteen miles every Sunday to have a chat with her!

Tough Cabbages.—"Old woman," said a drunken fellow who staggered to the closet for a cold supper, "where did you get these cabbages? they are so tarral stringy, I can't eat them."

"O my gracious!" replied the lady, "if that stupid fellow aint eating all my cabbages that I put in starch in the closet!"

New England Winters.—In the last number of the Gazette, we had an extract from Curwin's Letters, in which he stated on the authority of Doct. Holyoke, "that the winter of '70-50 exceeded any since 1750. It began before the middle of December, and lasted till June nearly; no vegetation taking place till the last week in May."

Sermon for old Bachelors.—The Hartford Mirror contains a lay sermon for the special benefit of the bachelors, founded on the following text:

"And they called Rebecca, and said unto her, 'Wilt thou go with this man, and she said, I will go.'—Genesis, xxiv, 58.

In those times ceremony, formality, sighing and sentiment were all together unknown. Rebecca was a good girl, and jumped at the first good offer.

The editor of the Norwich Aurora says he could have picked out a better text to preach before the honorable and venerable fraternity, viz:

"Jacob kissed Rachel!"

That is something substantial for bachelors to say grace over. The other text was for the benefit of Rebecca altogether.

"Jacob kissed Rachel,"

And he lifted up his voice and wept."

How pathetic! The fact is, says the Aurora, time and the fashions make strange inroads on poor human nature.—Here was Jacob scouring the country to look for a wife and on a fine sunny day in the valley of Padmarum, he saw her at a distance, drawing water from a well, being barefooted, and without ceremony he ran towards her, and in the language of the good book, "kissed her, and lifted up his voice and wept." We have no account that Rachel boxed his ears, for his rudeness, as in these days of simplicity and innocence she would have done, particularly in "good society."

O'Connell's son and Tom Steel are coming over to agitate.

The grand invention, the Aerial carriage, spoken of by us a week or two since, is said to have been realized. London is all agog to witness the flight of this modern Pegasus, which will take its departure for Paris shortly.

We have accounts of the shocks of the late earthquakes over nearly the whole of the continent of Europe, in Africa, and in Asia Minor. In Palestine, as usual, the shocks were quite severe.

Credulity of "Millerties" in 1718.

In the year 1712, Mr. Whiston having calculated the return of a comet, which was to make its appearance on Wednesday, the 14th of October, at 5 minutes after 5 in the morning, he gave notice to the public accordingly, with this terrifying addition: that a total dissolution of the world by fire, was to take place on the Friday following. The reputation that Mr. W. had long maintained both as a divine and a philosopher, left little or no doubt with the populace of the truth of his prediction. Several ludicrous events took place in consequence. A number of persons in and about London seized all the barges and boats they could lay their hands on in the Thames, very rationally concluding that when the conflagration took place, there would be more safety on the water. A gentleman, who had neglected family prayer more than five years, informed his wife that he was determined to resume that laudable practice the same evening, but she having engaged a ball at her house, persuaded her husband to put it off till they saw whether the comet appeared or not. The South Sea stock immediately fell to 5 per cent, and India Stock to 11. The captain of a Dutch ship threw all his powder into the river, that the ship might not be endangered.

The next morning the comet appeared, according to the prediction, and before noon the belief was universal that the day of judgement was at hand. About this time of the day, 123 clergymen were ferried over to Lambeth, it was said, to petition that a short prayer might be penned and ordered—there being none in the church service on that occasion. Three maids of honor burned their collection of novels and plays, and sent to a bookseller to buy each of them a Bible, and Taylor's Holy Living and Dying. The run upon the Bank was so prodigious that all hands were employed from morning till night in discounting notes and handing out specie. On Thursday, considerable more than 7000 missives were legally married, in the face of several congregations. And, to crown the whole, Sir Gilbert Heathcote, at that time head director of the Bank, issued orders to all the fire offices in London, requiring them to keep a good lookout, and a particular eye upon the Bank of England.

PORTALS

BY THE LATE WILLIAM ROGERS

"Twas on a calm bright summer's sunny noon,
While nature's fields were beautiful and gay;
And while the sunny fields of waving corn
Cloyed hills in green along the rich pathway:
The bell had slowly told a solemn lay.
But sounding not for sorrow, prayer and praise,
To call men's minds from earthly things away,
To where the low and meek, their voices raise
In supplicating God for blessings on their ways.

But mortal, sad and deathlike was the peal,
That grating slow, and harsh, on the ear—
It told a tale of woe, that seemed to steal
In sadness o'er the heart, and cast a fear
On all that "conquering death hath often been Here!"

And bath another victim for the grave—
Pregled, and lowly down upon his bier;
Beyond the power of human aid to save;
And o'er the more long the rank green
Grass shall wave.

And from a point and miserable cot,
We saw him borne unto his lonely tomb;
Where sighing care, and sorrow's ouches not,
The weary'd sleeper in a last long home,
Within earth's dark and solitary womb.
No sound to break the slumber of the dead—
No ray to cheer its fearful gloom;
Where all are laid deep in their narrow bed,
To wither and decay beneath the living's tread.

No grand display was there—no hirling tears,
To make a mockery of human woe;
No splendid mourning for the dead appears,
Nor heartless empty pomp, nor gilt ring show,
But one pale mourner, there, who followed Slow

And sadly to the grave, as if his form,
Beyond the power of stern mortuaries' storm,
To how no more beneath fate's unrelenting arm.

His form was bent with many a heavy year—
His locks were gray and scattered thin and bare;
His farrow'd cheek show'd where the sorrowing
Tear

Had often flow'd: grief's signature was there
And there, the marks of anguish and despair,
Age too, had left its hollow, sunken eye,
That show'd of life's sad lot, he bore a share.
And though he spoke not, now and then a sigh,
Told better, than grief and wordless agony!

And as he bent o'er the departed one,
To take a last look, and last farewell;
He thus bewail'd his own life's end now run
Near to the close, bound by no fleeting spell:
"To this sad world, to fear death's once fear'd Kneel."

"Alas, and is it thus my dying lay—
And art thou gone, within the grave to dwell?
And every hope and the most time destroy,
And leave but a broken heart and rained joy.

Once fortune smil'd upon my early life,
And pleasures flow'd like stream along my way.
No trouble then, and no heart-breaking strife,
To meet the bright light of my youthful day;
Or e'er a cloud of cheering hope bright ray,
And her sweet smile, who bore her lot with me;
And, what my fortune, all my joy to me;
Dear lovely woman, when,
Shall even glid the gloom of age in its decline?

"But now they all have pass'd—and there is No night,
In this sad world that now remains to me,
That's worth a wish, or even a glance, tho'—
No more now but wretchedness and misery;
For early hopes that once were full of glee,
All fled that mirth in pleasures bright domain,
And left but bitterness and poverty;
Yet while the life-stream flows along my veins,
There is one comfort left—the hope of heaven Remains!"

One of the most important items of news which we find in late papers is the discussion of a new commercial treaty between England and the United States, on the principle of a tariff reciprocity.
The following article is from the Liverpool Albion:

RECIPROCITY TREATY WITH AMERICA.
When any other nation has a view cannot be fully obtained, it is good policy to direct our exertions to the attainment of that which is apparently practicable. Applying this principle to the question of the Corn Laws, we may state that, however desirable may be the total repeal of those laws, there is little prospect of that object being attained during the present session of Parliament; nor is there much chance of their being admitted at a fixed duty during the existence of the present Ministry. Yet there is a mode by which these objects may be nearly, though not completely, accomplished, even during the present year. The object of both these measures is the regular and sufficient supply of grain at moderate prices, and the increased employment of our manufacturing population. Both these objects may, we think, be obtained by the following proposition: We make treaties with Portugal, admitting their wines on favorable duties, on condition of their admitting our manufactures on the same duties. This is the principle of reciprocity, and is a principle which is being applied in many other directions. We are also negotiating with the Brazils on the principle of giving and receiving equivalent advantages. We would suggest, then, that we should take a proposition to the United States on a similar principle of reciprocity, as it is proposed to admit their manufactures on a certain rate of duty, on condition of their admitting our manufactures at a similar rate of duties. Let this duty, for argument sake, be fixed at 20 per cent.
ad valorem; we admit their grain at an ad valorem duty of 20 per cent., and they, in return, admitting our manufactures at 20 per cent.;
the value of grain to be taken at the shipping port, and proved to the satisfaction of our consul there. Suppose, for example's sake, the value of the grain at the shipping port to be 5s.
per bushel, then the duty of 20 per cent. would be 1s. per bushel, which would be the duty payable on its arrival in England. Then the duty on our manufactures, say on a piece of cloth, value here 10s. would, at 20 per cent., be 2s.
per piece. This would be fair reciprocity, and would leap over the thousand difficulties which have impeded the settlement of this question—it would probably satisfy the moderate men of all parties, though it would displease the extreme parties of each party. The advantages would be immense, and a measure could be accomplished—the demand for manufactures would be greatly increased at once—the employment of the workmen, consequently, much extended—wages would, of necessity, advance, and the kingdom would receive a regular supply of grain at moderate prices. The landed men need not have much apprehension, for they would have a protective duty of 20 per cent., and the consumption of grain would be augmented by the more extended employment of the manufacturing population. The variable amount of the duty is an objection, but something must be conceded for the sake of obtaining admission of our manufactures on favorable terms. The proposal to the United States would enlist all their agricultural men in favor of the measure, and would induce them to compel Congress to alter their present tariff, and probably compel the Executive to accept our proposal. The same proposal might be made to the continental agricultural nations, whose interest would, most probably, lead them to accept our terms. Should any one nation ac-out offer, others would probably follow, as one country would become jealous of any other enjoying advantages from which itself was excluded. No one kingdom could complain, if the same terms were offered to each.

The growing additional population of the kingdom requires some additional employment for the working classes, and this measure does seem to point out the mode by which this desirable object may be obtained, and with little, if any, injury to the landed men, because they would escape those increasing heavy rates which must fall upon the land in proportion as the demand for employment compels the working classes to have recourse to provincial relief.

Should America reject our offer, the nation will bear the evils of the present corn-laws with more patience; but the influence of the landed men in Congress is too powerful to admit of much doubt that they would obtain a majority in favor of this proposal.

Victims of Millerism.—The Portland (Me.) American says: "We learn from the Augusta Banner, that a gentleman from Buckfield was carried to the Insane Hospital, at that place, last week, having been made crazy by a Millerite revival.
He is a husband and father, greatly respected and needed by his amiable and afflicted family. We understand that Millerism has broken out at Farmington Falls, and is doing a desolating work. Serious fears are entertained, lest several persons will become permanently crazy. Now the 23rd of April has passed; we had hoped that revivalists would allow this delusion to die quietly a natural death. But they seem willing to make capital out of anything. Their morning, noon, and evening meals are made of whole dishes of newly-cooked humbugs. Dr. Ray, superintendent of the Hospital, states in a late answer to the inquiries made to him, that five patients have been admitted to the Asylum, the victims of the Miller delusion. Eleven victims of Millerism have been admitted to the Massachusetts Lunatic Asylum.

Keen.—A celebrated engineer examined at a trial where both the judge and counsel tried in vain to browbeat him, made use in his evidence of the expression, "the creature power of a mechanic," when the judge rather tartly asked him what he meant. "Why, my Lord," said the engineer, "I meant that power which enables a man to convert a coat's tail into a judge's wig."

In England, Ireland and Scotland, the wheat is looking remarkably well, with every prospect of an abundant harvest.
Real estate in Manchester has depreciated five per cent. within the year past.

The shocks of an earthquake in Holland were so severe as to shake down chimneys.

A Wooden Leg.—A man down east, Joseph Marston, had his leg so pounded up in a saw mill last fall, as to render amputation necessary. An ingenious mechanic in the neighborhood has since made him a wooden one with all the usual joints, and every thing about it so perfect, that it is said the man takes cold when he wets the foot of the wooden leg.

A WINDFALL INDEED.—A woman restored from poverty to wealth.—If the following statement, which we copy from the Philadelphia Sentinel, be true, it may truly be called a windfall. "Some time ago a man by the name of Cannon was murdered at Cannon's Ferry, in the State of Delaware, and a brother who resided but a few miles from this city died of apoplexy a few days ago. These brothers had an only sister, who with three children kept a small boarding house somewhere in the city of Baltimore, but like many others was so poor that she could not pay the rent, and a relentless landlord had her goods seized, and the widow and her fatherless children were turned out of the house to seek shelter under the cover of an uncharitable world in the month of February.

We understand that in consequence of marriage, she was discarded by these brothers, who were very rich, but who being cut off from life in so sudden a manner, their entire estate, which, valued at four hundred and fifty thousand dollars, was not willed in any manner, and therefore the only will is that made by law.
This sister being the only surviving relative of the deceased, will come in for a large share of this world's goods.

A Little Soul.—In one of Dr. Jewett's Temperance Lyrics, says the Boston Mercantile Journal, published in the Temperance Journal, a paper which is edited by the Doctor, with great tact and spirit, we find the following good exemplification of a little soul:
"All men have souls, but some are small indeed—
Not larger than a small brass pin's small head,
If we must judge of them by outward acts;
For, Reader, I could give a score of facts
That prove the souls of some so very small,
You'll say they might as well have none at all.

I've seen a wretch creep softly through the door
Of his sick neighbor, not to ask his state,
Who, racked with burning pains, had scarce
the power
To lift his head, pale, trembling for his fate,
But while all eyes, save his, with tears were wet,
Approach the bed, and dun the man for debt.

Now just put such a soul
Within a small pipe bowl,
And with your thumb the open space defend;
In vain is all your care,
You cannot keep it there;
'Twill make a turnpike of the little end!"

VALUABLE DISCOVERY—COPPER MINE IN VIRGINIA.

Jas. Gordon Bennett, Esq.:

Sir—It gives me pleasure to furnish you with the particulars of the discovery I have recently made of a copper mine in Warren county, Virginia, now known as the Consolidated Copper Mine, which you will please lay before the public.

In my various travels through the mountains, sometimes in hope, sometimes in despair, I at last past over the formation of a vein indicating copper, which naturally attracted my attention, and in tracing it I found the vein entered the northeast end of a mountain, running parallel with a blue ridge, and in examination I also found that it had been worked by the British emigrants upward of eighty years ago, and whether they had been driven off by the Indians or the Americans, I have not been able to ascertain. However, be this as it may, the mine was abandoned, and in course of time the fortifications decaying, the shafts filled up. I also found several places that had been worked, at but one shaft in particular seemed to attract my attention, and induced me to commence opening of it out; in so doing I soon discovered some of the galleries, that they had driven on the vein out of which they have obtained several ship loads of ore, which must have been sent to England, supposed from Alexandria. Some of the oldest inhabitants can recollect seeing the buildings and blacksmiths shops standing near the shaft, the remains of which were burned down by the fire in the mountains.

This mine must have been worked at least from three to five years, from the work that has been done, down to the depth of Phave already gone between sixty and seventy feet; I am not at the bottom of their old shaft; some of the timbers I took out of the old fortifications were as sound as ever, and a great curiosity they were—the early mode they had of fortifying in these days compared with the present.

The ore can be obtained from two to three feet below the surface mixed with the green carbonate of copper, the component parts of the vein of porphyry, mixed with gypsum, and the blue, green and red carbonates of copper, and some small traces of native copper; it contains a sufficient quantity of gypsum to answer as a flux without adding more lime; this of course is a great advantage. The ore will yield from 5 to 60 per cent. A ton weight of which I have brought on with me, and also some of the copper that I have melted out in a small reverberatory furnace which I have built on the premises. The shaft I have sunk is 13 x 9 feet, out of which we have raised at least 100 tons of the ore, as our shaft is more than as large again as their old shaft; the ore is good and in great abundance all the way, but I have started no galleries as yet, and will not till I get below their old workings. I have driven on a cross-cut through the vein, and I find it from 12 to 18 feet thick. My object was to open the mine sufficient for examination, as well as to analyze the ores, so as to satisfy my mind respecting it before submitting my report to the public, as my intention is either to dispose of a part of the mine or form a company under a charter for the further prosecution of the operations thereof, as a furnace will be wanted immediately, and the mine put into a more extensive scale. All the particulars connected with this mine will be given in my report respecting the same to any capitalist willing to embark, subject to certain conditions, for the purpose of prosecuting the operations alluded to.

Now, from my long experience in the various branches connected with the mining business, and from frequent observations in my travels, as well as tracing the mineral veins to great depths, both in Europe, America and in the Copper Mines of the West Indies, I have had an opportunity of gaining information in the different offices I have filled above many of my fellow men, which enables me to form a more correct opinion of the geological formation of veins, and of the earth where these mineral veins are found, than if I had gained my information from theory alone, and the most candid explanation will likewise be afforded on every point connected with the undertaking from which a very large amount of profit on the sum employed is certain of being speedily realized.

For the permanency, regularity and richness of the ore at so small a depth, and the facilities connected with this mine brings me to this conclusion, and I hesitate not to say it is one of the greatest discoveries ever made in North America; and when a comparative estimate is given of the outlay and income of this mine, compared with the Royal Cabra Copper Mines of Cuba, twelve miles from St. Jago de Cuba, it will be seen that these mines do not surpass neither in the external appearance nor richness at the depth we are now at in the Consolidated Copper Mines.

Any communications, giving real name and address, directed to me, at the lower Post Office, N. Y., will meet prompt and respectful attention. I may be found at No. 22 Pine street, on the second floor of the old Custom House, between the hours of 9 and 3 o'clock, when any information on this subject will be given.

Respectfully,
 Your obt. servt.,
JOHN PEMMAN.
 New York, 27th April, 1843.

THE LAST GIFT.
 A touching and beautiful story is told by Lieut. Parson, in his "Nelsonian Reminiscences." A young man by the name of Richard Bennett was mortally wounded in one of Nelson's great battles and requested that a miniature, and a lock of hair should be given by Lieut. Parson, to his sweetheart, Susette, in Scotland.

The noble and gallant Lieutenant thus described the interview:

"It was at the close of day when a bright July Sun was at the point of setting, that I arrived at the pretty cottage of Susette's mother. I impulsively stated who I was to the most respectable looking matron I ever saw, of French extraction. In broken and bitter accents of heartfelt grief, she told me her daughter's death was daily looked for, and requested time to prepare her to see me. At last she expressed a wish to see the friend of Richard Bennett; and I was admitted to the fairest daughter of Eve that ever found this world unequal to her blossoms. She was propped up with pillows, near the open lattice of her bed room, that was clustered with roses. Her white dress, and the drapery of the room, adorned with the angelic vision, who now turned her lustrous orbs upon me, veiled in long fringed eye-lids. She held out her transparent hand, and gently pressed mine as I knelt to kiss it, and as she felt my tear drop on it softly murmured, 'I wish I could cry; that would relieve my poor heart.' She gasped for breath and respired with difficulty. 'The lock of hair, quickly while I can see it.' She caught it, wildly pressed it to her lips and heaved, and fell back. Her mother and I thought she fainted; but the pure and innocent soul had returned to God who gave it."

(From the Morning Chronicle Extra.)
TERRIBLE STEAMBOAT ACCIDENT.

On Friday night last, about 11 o'clock, as the steamer Forrest was laying to, to put out a passenger in a skiff, about 20 miles up the Alleghany river, with her head down stream, the Pulaski, which was coming up, having on board about 150 passengers, ran into her, the bow of the Forrest striking the side of the Pulaski opposite her boilers. The boilers were immediately thrown down by the concussion—the steam pipes separating and the hot steam rushing among the passengers and scalding them in a most terrible manner. The Pulaski, whose side was broken in by the bow of the Forrest, immediately sunk to her boiler deck.

From the statements of Mr. Enos, a hand on board the Forrest, and of several other passengers, we think that certainly two and probably five or six were thrown overboard and lost. The names of these, of course, it will be difficult to ascertain, as there was so many passengers on board the boat. One of them was said to be a hand on board the Pulaski. Another person was seen floating past, calling piteously for assistance, and he sank before it could be rendered him. Another went under the wheel, and three or four others were seen in the water, apparently making very little exertions to save themselves; but we are inclined to think that some of these latter were good swimmers and reached the shore. One young man we saw who swam ashore, having jumped from the cabin window.

The names of the sufferers who are scalded, are as follows:

Wm. Coon, of Erie county, N. Y., very badly scalded on the body.

Michael Hawkins, the steward of the Pulaski also very badly scalded. The two above mentioned are the worst injured, but they will probably recover.

Sheridan McCullough, of Redbank, Jefferson county Pa., near Brookville, hands, arms and face very badly scalded.

James Gilson, of Oak Creek township, Crawford county Pa., badly scalded.

Joseph Hughes, of Jefferson county Pa., hands and face badly scalded.

Wing, slightly scalded in the legs but able to be about.

All the above, with the exceptions of Wing, were brought down by the Forrest, and are receiving every attention from the hands of Mr. Valentine Fohl, the landlord of the Travellers Home at the foot of Irwin street.

The thanks of the humane are due to Dr. Speer, of Pittsburgh, and Dr. Dale of Alleghany, for their prompt and efficient attention to the sufferers at the late hour of night at which the Forrest arrived, as well as Mr. Fohl, Mr. J. A. Stocton and many other gentlemen whose names we did not learn.

We asked several of the passengers, but could not learn that the blame was to be attributed to any one for the occurrence of the accident.

The freight which was on the Pulaski such of it as was not destructible by water, will be saved. There will probably be no attempt made to raise the boat as she is a badly injured that it will not pay the trouble.

Foreign.

FRANCE.
 The weather has become broken, but was still warm in Paris. Already the markets feel the influence of the fine spring season experienced in France.

SPAIN.

The new Chamber is said to be composed as follows:—Anti-coalitionists, 103; Coalitionists, 61; Doubtful, 18. The 103 will, no doubt, support the Regent and all the measures of the present Ministry. As to the exact men they may desire, is another affair. Accounts from Madrid of 28th ult. state that the second elections were proceeding in favor of Ministers. On that day the lease of the Almaden quicksilver mines was adjudged to Senor Salamanca, at 81 dollars the quintal. Mr. Weissweiler, agent of the house of Rothschild, lost the prize by a few reals.

Madrid papers of March 30th publish the ceremonial to be observed at the opening of the Cortes. The Queen and Regent are both to be present. The latter opens the Chambers with a speech. The Royal Session takes place in the saloon of the Senate. In the other circumstances of the ceremony there will be no novelty. The Senate held its first or preparatory meeting that day. The deputies have not yet held their preparatory session. A large number is understood to have arrived in Madrid. There was seldom less speculation here on an occasion of this kind about the relative strength of parties, or the character which the deliberations of a new Chamber was likely to assume. No party, indeed, pretends to prognosticate the course of events, or claim their direction.

RUSSIA.
 A letter from St. Petersburg of the 16th ult., published in the "Gazette des Tribunaux," states that the Emperor of Russia had granted a full amnesty to a number of Poles exiled to Siberia or the interior of Russia, for the part they had taken in the revolution of November, 1830.

GREECE.
 Athens letters of the 20th ult. mention that King Otto had fallen out with the French party; and their champion, M. Christides, the Minister of the Interior, but was afraid to dismiss the latter from his post. No answer had yet been received from the protecting powers respecting the loan. The comet had been seen at Athens during the last ten days every evening after sunset.

TURKEY.
 The arrangement of the difference between Turkey and Persia is said to have made no progress since our last accounts from the Turkish capital. The last mail from Trebizond had brought intelligence of the death of the Ottoman Plenipotentiary, Nourri Effendi.

EGYPT.
 The advices from Alexandria are of the 16th ult. Some alterations were about to be introduced into the commercial treaty between Great Britain and Turkey. The accounts from Syria were of the 10th ult. The country was tranquil, and the Kiamians were still engaged in adjusting the claims of the sufferers by the last insurrections.

ALGIERS.
 General De Bar, who went out with a considerable force to chastise several hostile tribes, had been compelled to return without effecting the desired object. The Arabs in immense numbers crowded the heights of the mountains, and fired upon his troops; and as a measure of prudence he beat a retreat, lest he should expose his army too serious losses. During his march he was engaged in only one regular affair with the Arabs, who were defeated; but the French had several men killed and wounded.

CHINA.
 The latest dates brought by the Overland Mail, are—Alexandria, March 25; Calcutta, February 19; Ceylon, February 21. China—Macao, January 20; Chusan, January 12; Hong-Kong and Nankin, January 14; Delhi, February 18; Lahore, February 5; Madras, February 21; Manila, January 21; Mauritius, January 21; Seinde, February 23; and Singapore, January 28.

Tranquility continues to be preserved at Canton, and the perturbed and discontented spirit which led to the riot of the 7th December, and which still in some degree prevails amongst the populace, seems likely to be entirely subdued. An attempt to blow up one of the public gates of the city, afforded some time ago, sure evidence of its existence; but the prompt issuing by the government, of proclamations couched in a resolute and decided tone, and which had the effect of preventing any serious disturbances, proved at the same time the anxiety of the Chinese officers to rivet the good feeling now subsisting between the two governments.

Elepo, the high imperial commissioner, deputed by the Chinese government to conduct the commercial negotiations with Sir Henry Pottinger, arrived at Canton on the 10th of January. It was arranged that the first negotiatory conference should be held at Whampoa.

With respect to the new tariff, nothing has transpired as to the terms which are likely to be recommended for the adoption by the merchants. The Imperial list of duties will, however, it is thought, be the basis of the tariff. When Elepo reached Canton, the Hong merchants expressed their desire to have an interview with him, which he declined. The claims for indemnification proffered by parties whose property was destroyed during the disturbances of the 7th and 8th of December, have not been settled. The river at Canton continues to be infested with pirates to a dangerous extent, and these desperadoes seem to grow more daring and audacious in their deeds. An English lorch, or lighter, called the Enterprize, had been attacked and captured; her cargo, worth £25,000 plundered, and her captain and officers, and four Manila sailors, cruelly put to death. Mr. Wilson, a European passenger, tea taster to the firm of Turner & Co. had a hair-breadth escape.

Christian Invektive.—We find the following choice specimen of invective in Cotton Mather's Primitive Quakers. Some of the remarks in his Life of Wesley, that the Quakers exceeded all other sectarians in this species of invective. Fisher thus addressed him:—"Thou fiery fighter and green headed trumpeter; thou hedgehog and grinning dog; thou bastard that tumbled out of the mouth of the Babylonish bawd; thou mule; thou tinker; thou Lizard; thou bell of no metal; but the tone of a kettle; thou wheelbarrow; thou whirlpool; thou whifflet; O, thou fire-brand; thou adder and scorpion; thou louse; thou crowding; thou moon calf; thou ragged tatterdemalion; thou Judas; thou livest in philosophy and logic which are of the devil! It is a singular fact that Christians, who profess to be disciples of the only religion of peace, are the most excellent of all nations in the arts and practice of war; and that of all Christians sects, that one whose members call themselves Friends, should be most excellent in blackguardry."

POETRY.

BY WILLIAM ROBERTS.

Oh! taste not of the cup, for there
Are lurking seeds of future woe.
Heart breaking anguish and despair
Is that which from the goblet flows.
Yea, poison lurks within the bowl, [soul,
That's death forever both to the body and the

Although ye fear not now to drink,
Yet time will come when ye shall say,
Oh had we once but stop'd to think
Ere we thus far had gone astray;
Ere we had quaff'd our pleasures up
That we thought upon the curses of the cup.

That even every hope betrays,
The spring of sorrow and of shame,
That crushes, ruins all our joys,
And blights and withers every smile.
Beastly and infamous, degrading, man and vile.

Taste not the cup, its bitterness,
The very dregs of misery,
Its joys first wear a winning dress,
Yet ends in robbish infamy.
Oh! woe! is the drunkard's doom—
The downy, gallowa-tree, or else an early tomb.

Just cast a single glance around,
Upon your native land,
And many a soul ye shall see bound
By that insinuating band.
Full many a widow's tears are shed
For husbands lowly laid, in their last narrow bed.

And many an orphan's voice you'll hear,
Lamenting a mother's name,
Who valued not that little dear,
But lived a wretched life of shame;
And broke that dear and holy tie
That bound him to his child, but yet for drink would die.

To a Ring-leader in the late Missouri Persecution.
Thou bloody man, without a tear,
Without a trembling or a fear,
Could cries of innocence not keep Thy reckless fury from its sweep?
Could not a mother's tears withhold
Her offspring from thy vengeance bold?
Could not the smiling babe assuage
Thy cruel and relentless rage?
No! thou didst glory in the show
Of human misery and woe.
And thou didst glory in the thought Of wretchedness that thou hadst brought.

Foreign.

TEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF THE GREAT WESTERN.

The Great Western, Captain Hoskins, arrived on Friday, the 12th instant, at New York, in twelve and a half days from Liverpool. From the New York Sun and the English papers, we gather the following items:

The Liverpool papers are still complaining of the abundance of money—the unhealthy superfluity of the mercantile world, while interest can only be obtained from bankers to the extent of two per cent. the money holders will run to stocks, railroads &c. foreign and domestic.

The English papers are filled with accounts of murders as our own are. Mr. Edward Everett, the American minister, has written a letter to the New Farmer's Journal, to contradict the statement reported to have been made by Mr. Joseph Hume M. P. at a meeting of the Anti-Corn-law League in Drury Lane Theatre—namely, that "at a public meeting held in September last, at which the Duke of Rutland presided, Mr. Everett American Minister stated, that bacon which would bring 6d. per pound here, was actually used as fuel for steamboats with them, having no other way of getting rid of the superfluity."

The discussion of the right of visit, or the right of search—call it what you like, for in America the terms are held to be identical, while in England they are held to be very dissimilar; has been revived with vigor, contingent upon the arrival of Mr. Webster's despatch to Mr. Everett, which came to hand on Tuesday. Mr. Webster adheres with becoming pertinacity to his views which every one on this side admits to be ably sustained; and the British Government depend upon it, will adhere with no less pertinacity to theirs.

But the question, after all, is rather abstract than practical; and with the honesty of purpose which Mr. Webster claims for the United States in putting down the slave trade, cannot be productive of any collision.

Death of the Duke of Sussex.—The death of the Duke of Sussex, who expired at his apartment at Kensington, on Friday, the 21st instant, at about half past 12 in the day, has excited more than ordinary attention. For some days previous not the slightest hope was entertained of his recovery, and the fatal termination of his illness, though it excited little surprise, has been productive of an almost universal feeling of regret at his loss. The journals most opposed to the liberal politics of the Duke, express the highest respect for his amiable and independent character, and a becoming estimation of his scholarship and attainments.

His Royal Highness, Prince Augustus Frederick, was the ninth child and fifth son of George the Third, and was born the 27th of January 1783, being consequently about seventy years and three months old at his death.

The Duke was twice married, although neither of the marriages received the sanction of the Royal Marriage Act.—First to Lady Augusta de Ameland Murray, at home, in April 1793, which marriage was declared null by the Pre-rogative Court, in August following.—The issue of this marriage are, Sir Augustus d'Este, born January 15 1794, and Ellen Augusta Mademoiselle d'Este born August 11 1801. Lady Augusta Murray survived her separation from her illustrious husband until March 1830. The Duke's second wife, Lady Cecilia Gore, daughter of the Earl of Arran, survives his Royal Highness; she was created Duchess of Inverness, March the 30th 1840.

The Duke of Sussex was through life the constant encourager (as far as his means allowed) of learning and science, and the patron of all deserving aspirants in the works of art—as well as the benevolent supporter of most of the various charities which adorn and distinguish the British metropolis.

Birth of a Royal Princess.—Her Majesty Queen Victoria has graced the British nation with another Princess. This event was made known through the columns of the metropolitan papers on the 25th inst.

Buckingham Palace, April 25.
This morning at 4 o'clock, the Queen was delivered of a Prince.

In the room with her Majesty were his Royal Highness Prince Albert, Dr. Lockett, and Mrs. Lilly, the monthly nurse; and in the rooms adjoining were the other medical attendants, Sir James Clark and Dr. Ferguson; also the Earl of Liverpool, Lord Steward of her Majesty's household.

Judging of what may, by what has occurred, there seems every chance of Mr. O'Connell's wish being gratified, that the Queen should have as many children as his grandmother—two and twenty!

At nine o'clock, the Park and Tower guns announced the joyful event to the inhabitants of the metropolis, by a double royal salute of forty two guns.

Extraordinary Emigration Bubble Scheme.—A most nefarious scheme for fleecing poor emigrants has just been brought to light, which has excited extraordinary interest from the number of titled, and other influential persons connected with it. It has been noticed in the House of Commons, in strong and indignant terms by Lord Stanley, and has been elaborately discussed in the press.

The Steam Ship Great Britain.—It is now fully expected that this wonderful boat will be launched at Bristol in the month of June next. May had been previously fixed upon, but owing to some difficulty in the boat, is now postponed to June. Prince Albert has consented to honor the city of Bristol with his presence on the occasion. She is intended to sail between Liverpool and New York.

Thames Tunnel.—From 12 o'clock on Saturday up to the same hour on Monday 28,642 persons went through the tunnel and since the opening upwards of 320,000. The holiday folks have given employment to three or four tollmen.

Chinese Ransom.—On Monday, six wagons arrived at the Royal Mint with upwards of one million and a quarter dollars worth of Sycee silver, being the last moiety of the first instalment, namely $5,000,000 of the Chinese ransom. The silver, as on previous occasions, is packed in strong wooden boxes, bearing the official seal of Sir H. Pottinger.

The marriage of the Princess Augusta is to take place immediately after the Queen's recovery.

Several of the most extensive landlords in Ireland had reduced their rents 20 per cent. of course much to the satisfaction of tenants. Earl de Gray had, however, given practical evidence of his high Tory principles by raising his rents in the same proportion.

A suspension bridge, surpassing all that has been seen, is to be constructed at Vienna, says a letter from this city, across the Danube. It will be 1,470 English feet in length, with only one pier in the river. The troubles in the Kirk of Scotland still continue. The Lords of the council and Session adhered to the decision of the Lord Ordinary, which set aside the iniquitous sentence of deposition pronounced by the General assembly upon the seven brethren of Stargrove.

Lord Brougham had some important motions in Parliament relative to the Slave Trade.

A large meeting was held on the 1st instant, in Exeter Hall, London for the purpose of adopting measures urgently required by the recent aggression of the French on Tattilo, and for securing the general interest of the British mission in the islands of the South Pacific.

In England, Ireland, and Scotland, the wheat is looking remarkably well, with every prospect of an abundant harvest.

The Northern Star recommends "that the Chartists throughout the length and breadth of the land should suffer their beards to grow, and that each of them should wear moustaches!"

Another of the gang known as "Rebecca and her daughters" in South Wales, had been seized and bound over for trial, and it was believed it would lead to the dispersion of the whole gang.

An instalment of a million and a quarter of dollars from the Chinese, arrived at London on the 16 ult.

Real estate in Manchester has depreciated nearly fifty per cent within the year past.

The shocks of an earthquake in Holland were so severe as to shake down chimneys.

Distress in England.—The sufferings of the poorer classes in England, has been long continued, and has now become very great. "No man," says the editor of the London Patriot, "who makes use of his eyes, and pays the slightest attention to evidence, can doubt that tens of thousands of our fellow subjects, with their wives and little ones, are upon the verge of starvation; and every man feels that such a state of things cannot continue long in a country like this, without the greatest risk to public order, the rights of property and all the bonds by means of which society is held together."

The Courier Francaise announces that the report of the budget would be laid before the Chamber of Deputies on the 15th of May, and that the debate would commence on the 25th. In that case, adds the Courier Francaise, the Chamber will have concluded all parliamentary business by the 25th of June, as the members always leave Paris after the debate on the budget.

The Moniteur publishes the details of the marriage of the Princess Clementine of Orleans with Prince Augustus of Saxo Coburg, which took place at the palace of St. Cloud.

SPAIN.
On the 15th, the Chamber of Deputies held a short sitting to examine a number of petitions connected with the elections, which were deferred to the following day, Easter Sunday. It was not believed that all the election returns could be verified or the House constituted before the close of the week.

The committee of the Senate, charged with preparing the address in answer to the Regent's speech had not yet completed its task. It was to be drawn up by either M. Marlin or M. Quintano, the Preceptor of the Queen.

The question of the prolongation of the minority of the Queen was beginning to be agitated. The Castellana contains a letter from Saragossa of the 12th, stating that the Ayuntamiento and national military of the city intended to present a petition in favor of that project to the Cortes.

Prince Jerome Napoleon Bonaparte had arrived at Cadiz.

The Patriots announce the arrest of the Treasurer of the sinking Fund, in consequence of a deficiency in his balance. "This measure was necessary," says the Patriots, "in order to support a system of morality indispensable in the administration of the Finance Department."

An extraordinary express from Madrid, with intelligence to the 19th has been received. The Madrid Gazette publishes two official documents emanating from the Ministry of Finance. The first is a formal order of M. Calatrava, to the Director General of the Sinking Fund, desiring him to prepare for the payment of the half years interest on the new three per cents due on the 30th June next.

Matters were beginning to assume a more settled appearance in the Congress.

PORTUGAL.
The late accounts from Lisbon announce that the negotiations relative to a commercial treaty with England, are for the present at an end. Lord Aberdeen adhered resolutely to the ground which he took four weeks since, and rejected, as of too unsatisfactory a nature to be entertained, the last proposition of Portugal. The British Envoy has been directed peremptorily to break off the negotiations—"interrupt" is the official word.

TURKEY.
A letter from Constantinople, of the 7th ult says: Russia has at length declared openly. The mystery that enveloped her projects has been dissipated. No doubt now remains that she is determined to ride rough shod over the Porte, and to impose her conditions on the Sultan, as if the Emperor were already undisputed master of all the Christian provinces upon the right Danube bank, and the Porte a mere subordinate—with out other power or will in its European districts, than that in which it may be permitted to exercise in the name and by consent of the Czar.

INDIA.
Calcutta papers to the 5th ult. inclusive brought to Alexandria by the steamer Tennasserim, to Malta by the Cyclops and then to Marseilles by the Acheron, have been received.

The papers thus received, are almost destitute of political intelligence. The successor of the late Maharajah of Gualior, was to be installed on the 20th ult. and no opposition to his accession, was to be apprehended. Lord Ellenborough was still at Argu, whither he had proceeded from Delhi, on receipt of the intelligence of the late Maharajah's decease.

No news of a later date than that received by the ordinary mail had been received in Calcutta either from Scinde or Cabul.

A Calcutta circular, of March 4th, gives the following business details:

In our circular of the 16th ult. we said that our money market had become exceedingly tight, and affairs generally are now in as bad a state as could well be conceived. Our bazaar is quite bare of cash.

Miscellaneous.—A new method of shipping corn at Dantzic, which threw some barges out of use, caused a riot on the 11th. The military were called out and the disturbance was not quelled until they had fired; one man being shot dead, and many others wounded and ridden down by the cavalry.

Longevity of Women.—There died throughout England and Wales, between 1st July 1840 and 30th of June, 1841; 5,247 females, and upwards; of the same age, there died only 3,984 males, leaving a balance in favor of the old ladies, of 1,263. Among the females who died, seventy-one had passed the age of 100, but only forty males.

The Vine Crop.—The intelligence from the vine districts respecting the effects of the frost on the 13th, 14th and 15th inst. may, says the Moniteur, be thus summed up: Longuedoc experienced little or no injury. The loss of the Bordeaux wines may be estimated at one-third of the crop; around Libourne, in two nights, one half of the buds were destroyed. In the country adjoining Cognac, the vines, des, premieres, bois, and champagne suffered considerably from the frost of the 13th and 14th. In the two departments of the Charente a similar calamity occurred. In Champagne wines suffered greatly.

MARKETS.
Latest London Money Markets.—Very few bargains have been transacted in the English market to day. 10,000,000 reals towards the payment of the next half year's dividend on the Three per Cent. Stock, on account of the quicksilver contract.

Liverpool, April 29th.—Corn.—The fresh supplies being only very moderate coastwise and from Ireland, and scarcely anything having been received from abroad for some time past, the imports have not had a tendency to depress prices, still they have gradually receded, and Wheat must be quoted 2d per 70lbs lower than on the 18th. There was rather a firmer tone in the Wheat trade this morning, and a moderate business was done at the decline. Flour was in request at previous quotations.

London, April 28.—Corn.—We have had fair supplies of English Wheat, more than sufficient for the demand, and prices must be noted 1s to 2s per qr. lower. Foreign has met a poor sale, at a reduction of 1s per qr. The transactions in Flour have proved limited, at late rates.

Provisions.—American.—No alteration has taken place in Beef or Pork, the demand for which has been altogether for ship's stores. Butter remains as last noticed. The supplies of Lard have proved very large, and prices have receded to 33s per cwt. There was a public sale of American Cheese, on the 27th, when a further decline of 2s per cwt. was taken.

Agricultural.

Grape Vines.—We hope every farmer and every mechanic who owns as much as six square feet of land, will have at least one grape vine growing on it—a native vine, we mean, not a foreign one for more show, but one that will bear fruit which will ripen without artificial aid.

It is surprising that so few of our young men take any interest in setting grape vines about the house. It is not because they relish not the fruit, for you will see them traversing the meadows and woods to fish what does not belong to them; and to make sure of their prey they will pluck it before it is fit to eat. How much less labor would it be to take home a root or a cutting, and place it where the grapes might hang on till they were fully ripe!

We have many native grapes in our meadows and by the roadside which are at least equal to the imported kinds. In addition to the common purple grape, many sorts of which are rich and excellent, when they are permitted to ripen on the vines, we have several kinds of reddish grapes that have not the foxy taste which some dislike in the purple kinds. Then we have a variety of wild white grapes.

In our own garden we have two kinds of white, or rather cream-colored grapes, from vines that we procured from our own fields. These ripen in the last of August, a month sooner than the Isabella grape. And these, together with the Isabella and the common purple grape, give us an abundance of grape fruit during five or six weeks of every season.

The grape is cultivated with less labor than any other kind of fruit, and it is a constant bearer. It is less subject to depredations of worms and insects than most kinds of fruit, and there is less trouble in having it in one's own garden than in going a mile to borrow a supply from a neighbor's meadow.

Young men are informed that grapes can be propagated from cuttings; that is, by burying a vine cut from a growing one. The latter part of April is a good time to bury the vine. One end of it must remain above ground and the other must be kept moist. [Ploughman.]

THE PEACH TREE.—ITS CULTURE.

The following facts in relation to fruits practised upon the public by Nurserymen: we copy from a Pamphlet entitled "Prime Facts for the Farmer, the Fruit Grower, and the Public," furnished by John Forman; Edited by M. R. Bartlett.

"In order to procure safe and healthy Seedling Stock of any kind, and above all of the Peach Tree kind, the ground for the Nursery Plants should be of a choice character;—dry, warm, and quick, and free from stone, grass, shade and harbors for insects. But why demand such select and rare quality of ground? Because this is the soil which receives the seed of the future Tree, and soil which, by a secret process of nature, unwraps the sleeping germ and wakes the tender shoot to life. In this soft and vivifying mold, the stem is formed and thrown upward to be nursed in the air by the kiss of the breeze and the sunbeam, and the root is drawn downward to extract its nutriment, as a child draws its life from the breast of the mother. Now, if that soil be cold, or wet, or barren,—if it be a sour clay, or a sterile sand-bank,—if it lie in the shade of the forest, the hedge-row, or the wild grass, what must be the nature of the nourishment afforded to the young plant? What would be said of a mother's designs upon her child, who, in calling in the aid of a wet nurse, should advertise for one with a cankered breast? Would she intend for the young sprout of humanity, a fair and healthy growth, and a long and happy life, or would she not purposely entail a sickly existence and a premature grave? If, then, foul intent would lie against the mother, with what design shall this Nurseryman be charged, who, year in and year out, and for whole trustrums of years, coolly prepares and deliberately vends to an unsuspecting and honestly confiding community, many thousands of Nursery Fruit Trees formed on Seedling Plants which have been nourished from the seed upward only at the CANKERED BREAST! Seedling Plants, gathered from all the winds of heaven, and all the bogs and waste lands of the earth!—sick at heart and eaten up by vermin at the root! The simple idea of such plants brings to mind the inquiry of the Prophet at the Valley of Dry Bones:—Neighbor, can such Seedling Plants live? Nurseryman, thou knowest that each and every hope of life must perish!"

"We speak advisedly and within the bounds of fact, when we say that the business of digging Seedling Roots, employs for a part of the year at least, more than one thousand hands, and that more than One Hundred Thousand of these wild and diseased roots, come to the New York market annually, and are re-planted in the neighboring nurseries! From these places they are subsequently sold out, and sent to every part of the continent! If it be asked how this traffic is conducted, the question, as to the general operation, is easily answered. The nurseryman employs laborers who go out into the fields, among hedges, and over waste grounds, and redeem this kind of stock from pasture lands and waste places, and, having cast the poor, unsightly upper portion away, make prize of the root as so much gain. This root is adopted in the warm and kindling soil of nursery ground, where the stump, thus reclaimed from the fens and bogs of waste lands, receives a graft from some well conditioned Fruit Tree, and then, to an unchooled eye, all looks fine and of a fair promise. But what is the true state of the case? Just below the 'beautiful cion,' there remains, covered up with earth the sickly Seedling Root, worm-eaten, canker-smitten, and heart-wasted, beyond the reach of art—the healing touch of nature, and the world of hope. To say that each and every root thus reclaimed, is necessarily sick and worthless, is saying too much; its possible and even probable, that among so many thousands, a few may be found sound and healthy; and it is possible also that a selection is made, and the actually decayed roots are thrown away. Yet many of our nurserymen know, we presume, and if they do not, we can tell them, that if all this care in the selection be made, their grounds are charged yearly with perfectly dead seedling stumps, grafts and all, which, when first planted, were too far gone either to sprout of themselves, or give nourishment to the adopted scion.

"To an individual familiar with the nature and due health of Seedling Plants, this base botchwork, in fact, no cheat whatever; for with him, the very gloss of the bark, the tinge of the leaf, or the leaf-bud, the simple blush of the plant, proclaims its condition, and every attempt at deception, lies as open to his eye as a noontide sunbeam. It is the want of knowledge in this behalf, among the great mass of mankind, who are the buyers, not the raisers, of Fruit-Trees, that has opened the way to the practice of impositions; and though it may add something to the credit and standing of the American bred citizen to say the frauds lie at the door of the Nurseryman from abroad more generally than at his, still they are none the less reprehensible,—none the less disastrous both to the propagation of good fruit and the moral character of our country. 'I bought these trees,' (pointing to a yard gentleman of fortune a few days since, 'and I gave him a round price for them, for he pronounced them the best fruit in his nursery; but, I hardly know how it is; my ground I fear is not of the right kind to grow fruit, for I have nursed them with unwearied care for more than five years, yet they have never shown me a blossom! They have never become an eye-sore to me, and I am resolved to have them removed out of sight.'"

"In a few minutes the jack-knife related the whole history of the scrawny Fruit Trees; every one of them was canker-eaten at the root, and as black as the ace of spades at the time they left Mr. —'s nursery!"

"Look into the towns and villages of the whole western country, and the complaint will be found almost universal. Choice Fruit Trees, as they were called, have been taken from some of our far-famed neighboring nurseries to the distances of two, three, and even four thousand miles, at a most grievous outlay of time and money, with the hope of enjoying the luxury of rich and elegant table-fruit, but in the end, every prospect built upon the boasted purity and excellence of the stock, has utterly perished. Such have been the frauds on one side and the disappointments on the other, that, in some of the Western States companies have been formed, who have planted nurseries, and divided an interest of 30 per cent. There is one of this kind in the vicinity of St. Louis which will compare to advantage, if not in point of extent, at least in respect to purity and healthiness of stock and the variety and richness of fruit, with the best nurseries in the old States. An interest is now forming to induce an establishment of this kind in East Florida, for the express purpose of supplying our market with healthy Fruit-Trees. Here, then, the evil so wantonly inflicted, will be found, as it ever has been found, to recoil in the end, upon the heads of the evil-doers. The frauds, these cunningly devised cheats, are wrong;—wrong in any State, and doubly wrong in a young and growing State like ours; where every false step carries us back toward the corrupt and rotten condition of the old countries of the East—a condition to which no true son of America will ever feel ambitious of being immediately promoted."

"We are not ignorant of the fact that the profession of propagating and training nursery trees for the purpose of fruit, has become a very widely spread business in our young confederacy, and that large estates are embarked in that pursuit. Nor are we ignorant of the fact that some of these estates, are conducted with the utmost fairness, and with all due respect to the character and standing of the profession, and the just expectations of the public in behalf of fair and wholesome fruit. That all of them are not so conducted, is the evil of which we complain, the evil which we aim to cure. How far we shall succeed in effecting a remedy, time only will determine."

"We are fully aware that in making our statements we are stepping on the toes of those who have corns, and therefore we feel bound, for the present to tread lightly. Thought to this widely sweeping charge, we are able to make some honorable exceptions, we deem it prudent to let distinctions rest where they are until we see the effect of this general accusation."

"The following directions for the growing of healthy trees, and at the same time lengthy bearers, we esteem worthy of the attention of the raisers of this delicious fruit:

"The following directions for the growing of healthy trees, and at the same time lengthy bearers, we esteem worthy of the attention of the raisers of this delicious fruit:

"In planting the young trees in the orchard, say about one year after the ingraft, care must be taken, in the first place, to set them some ten or twelve feet apart; this distance will admit a free team passage about the orchard. Then, in the next place, farther care must be taken to plant the roots of each seedling full eight inches lower in the earth than the depth at which it stood in the nursery.

This distance down places the roots quite out of the reach of the bug, and the worm, and gives them a fair hold upon the earth and the nutriment which it furnishes. Then, if it should so happen that the worm or other insect bark the tree and bore it, and even kill it at the ground, new shoots will immediately spring up from the safely bedded root, strong and full of health, and thus keep the orchard stock in good condition.

"In the spring next following this planting of the orchard, each tree must be cut off at the ground. Then from the root or stump thus left in the earth, fresh sprouts will soon shoot up, and these are to form the future peach tree.

The sprouts springing from the deeply grounded root, and forming the peach tree, are all held in an upright and family-like position, by the body of earth which surrounds them; and although the ground in which they stand may be extremely rich, and full of appropriate nourishment—and the sap very profuse, yet, being divided among so many suckers, it affords to each but a moderate share of nutriment; and that share may be easily regulated to suit any quality of ground by increasing or diminishing the number of sprouts.

"One great object in this mode of culture, is to secure, not a rapid, but a very moderate, not to say slow growth of the tree, and at the same time a sound and durable quality of timber, with a smooth and safe bark into which the rain and sleet will not penetrate, nor will the frost or post worm find a ready entrance.

BEES.

Hives should be looked into in this season, and all the litter and filth which has accumulated on the platform brushed away.

Salt should be kept constantly on the platform, under the bees. They are fond of the article and it is fatal to worms. Catmint herbs are agreeable to bees, and some of them should be planted near the hives.

Houses built to cover the hives, are a great nuisance. They afford a shelter to the bee moth, and it is not easy to destroy it when we have no ready access to the back of the hive.

Each hive should be set on a firm post four feet high. This should be so sheltered from wind and rain that the bees may fly from 10 A. M. to 2 P. M. The post must be saved off square, and a board 12 inches broad must be nailed on it firmly. This will form the platform of the hive.

Cut no notch or door in the hive for the bees to enter, but raise your hive 1-3 of an inch high by means of smooth chips of that thickness, that the bees may have access on all sides. If you raise the hive higher the bees are forced to go to the corner posts to climb up every time they go in. If you set the hive down closer they cannot enter.

It is well to visit your bees often in summer. If you come daily and behave civilly they will consider you their friend and you may cant up the hives with great ease without running any risk of being stung. You must not take a stranger with you. You will often find the moth worm crawling about the platform. He grows to be an inch in length when he can get a good living. Destroy every one you see, and let there be no crevices for them to hide or for the miller to lay her eggs. Every board should be smooth and sound outside.

Millers will be fluttering about the hive by the first of June if not sooner. These lay their eggs in, or near the hive when they dare to, and these are the parents of the bee moth—the great destroyer of the bee. If you can induce these millers to fly into a blaze which you may kindle near the hives in the evening you will do well. We have heard that a dish of whey, set near the hive will attract the miller, and cause her to drown herself in it. This scheme is easily put in practice, and we hope our friends will try it.

We have made it our practice to visit our bees every morning, and to cant up the hives and examine them—they would not let a stranger do it. We used to weigh some of our hives daily. One of middling size, in June, gained three pounds per day, for seven days in succession.

Choked Cattle.—A correspondent says, his mode of relief to choked cattle, is to let them have a good pinch of snuff. They will sneeze and throw up anything that is too large to pass down.—Try it.

To make Yeast.—Two middling sized boiled potatoes, and a pint of boiling water and two table spoonsful of brown sugar. One pint of hot water should be applied to every half pint of the compound. Hot water is better in warm weather. This yeast being made with out flour will keep longer, and is said to be much better than any previously in use.

The 'Prayer Red' Apple.—Can any of our readers furnish an account of the origin of this valuable apple? It appears to be unknown at the East, and is undoubtedly a native of the Western States. Some say it was introduced into Kentucky from Virginia. We consider it the most valuable apple brought into market. At the present time it sells 23 per cent. higher by the barrel than any other apple. We are told it is extensively cultivated in Clermont and Warren counties, Ohio. An eastern horticulturist, who traveled through the Southern and Western States last winter, pronounced it (in a letter to the editor of the Ploughman) "very remarkable for its richness of flavor, size, color, and soundness." He adds that he met with it at different points on the Alabama, Mississippi, and Ohio rivers. He was informed that the fruit originated in Kentucky, and was much cultivated in that State and Ohio—and that there were nurseries at Cincinnati, where the trees and seedlings might be obtained. The trees are said to be hardy and good bearers. The fruit is large and less acid than the famous Baldwin, but very rich. It resembles the Jargon nelle pear, in flavor and the consistency of its pulp, which is of a light bluish color. The apple is pronounced to be decidedly the best winter fruit cultivated in the west.—Mass. Paper.

THE NEIGHBOR.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 7, 1833.

A second pleasure party has been got up, and our young citizens have had an opportunity of enjoying themselves in an excursion to Quincy, on Saturday last.—Captain Jones had the ferry boat fitted up in good style and a band of music in attendance. Joy was pictured in every countenance; and on leaving the Nauvoo House, all went off with smiling faces, the band playing a lively tune. We suppose there must have been something over fifty couples.

On our arrival at Quincy, we were forcibly reminded of the time when in company with thousands of saints we arrived in that city, about four years ago, under different circumstances.

When the Latter Day Saints were driven by a set of demons, from their homes, their property destroyed, and they left to wander with their families in the woods in the winter, the humane inhabitants of Quincy opened their homes to receive them from the pitiless storm; and their benevolence, and philanthropy, was abundantly manifested in administering to the wants of the needy, the persecuted, and oppressed; and for this act of humanity, whatever may have been the conduct of individuals, the kind, benevolent, and friendly disposition that was then manifested to our brethren by the citizens of Quincy, have left in our bosoms feelings of gratitude and respect, that years cannot obliterate; and we hope that the citizens of Nauvoo will ever remember them with gratitude.

At this season of the year, the appearance of the country on all hands, nature seemed to have adorned herself in her most beautiful dress, and the feathered tribe gave us a hearty welcome as we glided along. One thing we observed that the country was generally more backward than usual, and the wheat crop will fail of an average produce; our farmers have already begun to not accordingly. Within the last two weeks, flour has risen from one and a half to two dollars per hundred.

Our company were glad when they again reached Nauvoo, having been delayed sometime at Keokuk by a thunder storm.

The dog-law has come into operation in Nauvoo. The canine race in the city must now keep close quarters, walk about muzzled, or be content to appear in the shape of "shaggy dogs."

Curiosity.—A Miss Fix, near Reading, Pa., met her death on the 13th inst. in a most distressing manner. She was sent into the garret to take a clothes line down; and in climbing up to loosen it from a hook to which it was fastened, fell, and was caught in the line by her neck, and instantly strangled.

Six Persons Lost.—On the 5th ult. a small sloop left Michigan City with a full freight, and six persons on board. She was captured the next day and all on board perished.

Shelbed.—A teacher in Richmond, Va., was stabbed a few days since by a lad who was his pupil. The wound was inflicted with a pen-knife, in the arm, and was very severe.

Breach of Promise.—A case was recently determined in the Massachusetts Supreme Court, says the Baltimore Sun, which is of some interest to unmarried men. It was a suit for breach of promise of marriage, in which the jury awarded Miss Maria Clark one thousand and fifty four dollars damages. There was no positive proof of an engagement between the parties, and the evidence of a circumstantial nature, on which the plaintiff replied, was of a character so inconclusive, that the verdict cannot be otherwise regarded than as most extraordinary. The circumstances of their sitting up together frequently late at night, walking and riding out together, and other acts of innocent intercourse, induced the jury—under the instructions of the court, that no action could be sustained for the violation of an express promise though the fact of an express promise might be inferred from circumstantial evidence—to award the heavy damages above stated. Young men must be careful about walking out frequently and sitting up late at night with the girls.

Accounts from Africa, in the French papers, lead us to believe that Abel Kadir is still secure in his mountain and desert fastness—"unconquered and unconquerable."

THE ORDER SYSTEM.

The system of paying in orders, which has of late become so common in our country, is of the most harassing nature to the poor man, and is equivalent to a reduction of 25 per cent. if not more, on his hard earnings. It originated no doubt, at a time when scarcity of money was the common cry, but at present, when money is so abundant there is no excuse for its continuance, save in the grinding spirit of avarice which would give unto the poor man a bare subsistence, nothing more, and keeping him stamped in poverty, and swell yet more largely the pockets of the wealthy, and those who have become so on the sweat of others' brows. It is a shameful practice, and one which every mechanic and laborer should set his face resolutely against. It is an imposition upon industry, and an indirect method of reducing the wages of the poor, and pouring money into the coffers of the wealthy. Every one knows, who has unfortunately had the experience of this kind of payment, that the method of paying these orders is on the "take this or nothing" principle; and that in addition to the advance on the cash prices which he is obliged to submit to, the holder of this kind of paper is frequently compelled to wait the pleasure of the person on whom the order is drawn, for its payment at any price while himself, or family perhaps, is suffering for the necessities of life.

The whole system is radically wrong, as the burden of it falls on those who are least able to bear it—the poor and hard working laborer and mechanic. It is a plot between those who have money, to keep it from those who have not, and for the rich man to reap the benefit of the poor man's labor without rendering him an equivalent. To cite a case: A grocer wants to build him a house—he makes a contract with the master-builder for the job, stipulating that "the hands" are to be paid with orders on his store—delegates what he sees fit—the mechanic knows he is cheated; but what can he do? He has not money to go elsewhere, he must take the man's goods at his own price or starve—and thus the grocer comes into possession of a house, one half the price of which has been ground out of the hard earnings of the poor man who has toiled day after day, and finds himself at the end of the year as poor as when he commenced it. The instance is not a solitary one, nor confined to any particular branch of mechanics; the same evil is felt forcibly by the workmen in every kind of employment, and it is one which they should not trust to their masters to see remedied, but assert and defend their own rights—not by violence, outrages, or acts of society, but by an unwavering determination not to exchange their labor for anything but a fair and righteous equivalent.

Their labor is as necessary to the rich as the money of the rich is to them, and they should not allow themselves to be cheated in the exchange. In England, under the name of the "truck system," the abomination is forbidden by law. A righteous law! and one which should find a place in our code. We are glad to perceive that the mechanics and workmen in different parts of the country have determined to be shaved by this nefarious process no longer. "Cash pay and no orders" is their motto, and it should be that of every workman, whether mechanic, laborer, trader or merchant, throughout the country. When once generally adopted, it becomes easy for all, and a man will then know what price he is getting for his labor, and be freed from the cringing blighting state of servitude which the "order system" imposes.

Let the people, the working people, assert their rights, and asserting dare maintain them. The cry of hard times and scarcity of money is still kept up only to deceive them. The times are not hard—money is not scarce; the necessities of life were never more abundant or cheaper, and any one who reads the newspapers knows that there is no lack of money in the country. All that is wanted is to have it circulated, and there is no surer method of doing so than by abolishing the "order system" and adhering firmly to the cash system. It is the only way, and should be resolutely adopted.—(Boston Bee.)

Wives of Working Men.—Speaking of the middle ranks of life, a good writer observes, there we behold a woman in all her glory, not a doll to carry silks and jewels, not a puppet to be dangled by fops in idyl of profane adoration; reverenced to day, discarded to morrow; admired, but not respected; desired, but not esteemed; ruling by passion, not affection; imparting her weakness, not her constancy, to the sex which she should exalt; the source and mirror of vanity; we saw her as a wife, partaking the cares and guiding the labors of her husband, and by her domestic diligence spreading cheerfulness around her; for his sake sharing the decent refinements of the world without being vain of them; placing all her joy, all her happiness in the merited approbation of the man she loves. As a mother we find her affectionate, the ardent instructor of the children she has tended from their infancy; training them up to the virtue, to meditation and benevolence, and dressing them as rational beings, and preparing them to become men and women in their turn. Mechanics' daughters make the best wives in the world.

Execution of the Murderer of his father.—Benjamin D. White was hanged at Batavia, N. Y. last week for murdering his own father. The hardened character of the criminal is already known. He has written his life and dying speech. Up to the hour of his execution he remained indifferent about his fate; continued to express his admiration of infidelity and atheism, and his detestation of Christianity; refused to permit his body to be decently interred by his relatives, and insisted upon its being dissected by the doctors. A few moments before his death he declared that if his father was yet alive he would kill him if he could. On the day of the execution he permitted a minister of religion to pray with him because a relative of his had urged it. He read his speech at the scaffold, after which the clergyman prayed, but White amused himself with gazing around during the solemn hour. During all the preparatory movements he moved not a muscle, and was as self-possessed as the firmest patriot. At ten minutes to three the sheriff said: "White you have only three minutes to live." He remained standing calmly for a little over two minutes, when the cap was drawn over his face, and White was launched into eternity. In about half a minute he gave a spasm, which was followed by twenty-two more slight ones within the space of ten minutes. In half an hour the body was lowered, placed in the coffin, and laid in the jail.

THE CONVICT'S LAMENT.

BY VERI.

And must I remain here?

Here, to drag out in lingering torments, My miserable life? Oh, hard is my fate. That here, where all is darkness—damp, dreary Darkness, must I now remain, and ne'er dream, Ah! I can dream, but too soon cheating dreams Are past, and stern reality brings me back! What I am—O, how I thought—for life A tenant of the Convict's murky cell: And brightest dreams are followed quick by dark. And propertied despair. Would hope but shed One bright and cheering hue—one pleasing ray. O'er my dark and gloomy mind, and gently fan As with soft zephyr's refreshing coolness, My hot and tortured brain,—could I but hope! My guardian powers would hear my prayers, And with sweetest tones bid this shackled frame Go free.—This frenzied brain be calm,—and these eyes

To lose their wildness,—this pained,—this bursting heart. Would but with joy,—would vibrate in calmness.

O sweet Liberty!

From me thou art forever gone. No more Can I wander forth, and flitting through scenes Of peace and loveliness, enjoy the pleasures Thou givest: ne'er again view the bright And glorious splendor, that hovers round The Sun, as in majesty he rides onward, Shedding o'er earth his life reviving rays, Changing night's gloom to the brightness of day. The soft azure sky, with all the magic power That harks within its glory—the music And with cadence sweet—the weaving of the Ancient forest, that for centuries hath borne The rage of elements—the deep rolling Ocean, with all its grand sublimity; O'er whose silent billows with safety The hardy mariner guides the fragile bark—The murmuring of the little rill, that Bends sweetest music with Nature's beauty—Are scenes and music, that have no pleasures For him that dwells within a dungeon's walls: Yet my mind is with them—views their beauties. O crime!

That taints the soul, and hurls it in to woe! That forces with irresistible power, Its poorer qualities in disgrace to fly Their genial sphere. 'Tis thus my mind is broken: Each guilty passion still gnaws unrelenting, And drives raving madness through my torn brain:

Oh! that I could but ease its pain—I can—I will! welcome—welcome—thrill welcome—Death!

THE STOVEN BOAT.

FROM THE JOURNAL OF A SAILOR.

Of all pursuits that men follow in order to obtain a subsistence, there is none that will compare in danger and hardship with that of whaling; and yet how little people on shore know of this. It is in order to let them have some insight into this business that I have written the following narrative:—

I shall confine myself to the facts as they occurred, all of which I put down in my journal soon after they transpired. On the 11th day of Dec. 1837, the good ship P. of Newburg, Capt. C., was cruising somewhere between the latitude of 33 and 37 S. and longitude of 60 E. in search of "right whale." It was in the forenoon, and the ship was moving along under her top-gallant sails, with a light breeze, at a rate of about five knots the hour. The most hardened grumbler could not find fault with the day. At the fore and main top-gallant cross trees were two men on the look-out for whales.

It was now nearly four o'clock in the afternoon, when the man at the main sung out "there she blows!" He repeated the cry regularly for five or six times. All was now excitement among the officers and men. Every one was anxious to know if it was the kind of whale we wanted.

The mate hailed the man at the mast-head:

"Where is that whale? What do you call her?"

"Right whale, sir, on the lee beam, two mile off; look out sharp for her."

"Sing out when the ship heads for her!"

"Ay, ay, sir."

Keep her away, said the captain to the man at the helm. Boy, hand her the spy glass!

"Steady!" sung out the man at the mast-head.

"Steady it is," answered the wheel.

The captain then started to go aloft.—"Mr. A. (to the mate) you may square in the after-yards, and then call all hands."

"Forward there," shouted the mate, "haul the main-sail to and square the yards!" (to an old sailor)—"Sir!—Call all hands."

"Ay, ay, sir."

"All hands aloft," shouted old Bill, in a voice like the tempest; "stand by the boats." In less than no time, the deck was alive with men.

"Boat steers, get your boat ready." In a moment the boats were ready, the tubs put in, and the lines bent on the harpoons, the crew standing by ready to follow the boats down to the water, when the word came from the captain to lower away.

"There she blows," sung out the man at the fore. "Not half a mile off."

"Down helm," shouted the captain. "Mr. A. brace mizen topsail; hoist and swing the boats, and lower away."

Down went the boats, and down followed the crews. As the boats struck the water, every man on his thwart, with his hands on the boom of his oar; and less time than I have taken to write this, the three boats were cutting their way through the water in the direction of the whale.

"It was my duty to steer the mate's boat, and she happened to be the fastest puller, so that although we all left the ship together, and for a few rods kept nearly head and head with each other—still we knew well enough that as soon as the word came from the mate 'go away,' we should drop the others in a moment. So we did not fear ourselves, but kept cool for a tight pull when the whale should show himself on the surface of the water again, which he did in a moment after.

"Here she is," cried the mate, and not over ten rods from the boat. Now, my dear fellows, lay back hard—spring hard; I tell you. There she blows—only give way, my boys, and she is ours."

The boat bounded forward like a thing of life. "Spring like tigers," says the mate, his voice sinking almost to a whisper. I looked to see what kind of a chance I was about to have; at the same time pulling with all my might. We were going on her starboard quarter, just the chance I liked to fasten to a whale.

"Stand up," shouted the mate, and in a moment I had two harpoons to the whales into her.

"Stern, stern all," sung out the mate as he saw the iron into the whale. "Come here my boy," said he to me. We shifted ends, he to the head and I to the stern of the boat. The whale started off like lightning.

"Hold on line!" said the mate, and away we shot after her like an arrow from a bow. The mate by this time had his lance ready. "Haul me on that whale!" he shouted, and all hands turned to hauling line, while I coiled it away in the stern sheets. We had got nearly up to the whale; when she went to sounding, taking the right up and down from the head of the boat. I had two turns of the line around the log-gerhead, and was holding on as the boat would bear, when all at once, another large whale that we knew nothing about, shot up out of the water nearly her whole length, in a slanting position, hanging directly over the boat. I threw off the turns from the loggerhead, and shouted to the men to "stern!" But it was of no use—she fell the whole of her body on the boat. I heard the crash, and as I went down I felt the pressure of water directly over my head, caused as I then thought by the whale's flukes as she struck. How long I was under water I know not; but I remember that all looked dark above me, and I tried very hard to shove my head through, in order to breathe. At last I succeeded; but what a sight was that on which I gazed, when I found myself on the surface of the water. About a rod from me was the whale that we were fast to, thrashing the water into a foam with his flukes: the ocean red with blood, and the crimson streams pouring from the wounds in the whale made by the harpoons. In another direction I could see pieces of the boat floating about. At the distance of two or three miles I could occasionally get a glimpse of the ship, as I rode on the top of a swell, and not a human being in sight. Most forcibly did the words of the poet apply to my situation at this moment:

"Oh, soldier! where are the charms That sighs have seen in thy face? Better dwell in the midst of alarms! Than roga in this horrible place!" So thought I as I struck out for a piece of our once beautiful boat, a few rods distant. The crew came up, one after another, catching anything they could see to keep them aloft. One poor fellow came paddling along with two or three oars broken him, crying out that his back was under. Another of the crew and myself got him on a piece of boat we had hold of. His thigh was broken, and he could not move at all. The second mate soon after picked us up with his boat, and so much had we been engaged in looking out for ourselves, that we did not discover that one of our number was missing.

But alas! it was too soon found out. He was a young man about 17 years old, and did not belong to the boat, but went in the place of the midship oarsman, who was sick at the time. The whale fell directly on him, and probably killed him in a moment.

With what feelings we pulled around and round the spot where the boat was stoven, unwilling to believe, even after we knew there was no hope, that our shipmate was gone, never more to return!—And how silent we glided along side of the ship, and hoisted in our shipmate, now lamed for life!

Oh, that some of those people who look upon sailors as little better than brutes, and who know little or nothing of those kind feelings and glowing affections that are concealed under their rough exterior, could have seen what I saw on board that ship, even their hearts would melt—and they would find that it is not always the polished and educated, the smooth faced and handsome man, that has the warmest heart or the most generous feelings.

THE NATIONAL DEBTS OF EUROPE. [From Hunt's Merchants' Magazine.]

To form a correct estimate of the debt of the principal European states, is a task which is made impossible by obstacles which the most exhausting industry would find it difficult to remove. The governments themselves, in the first place, falsify in many instances, the actual amount of their obligations; the debts when reported, in the second place, are often made up of items, which, like the treasury notes of Sweden, are issued without limit and without computation; and the provincial debts themselves, in the third place, which enter so largely into the actual incumbrances of the nations of the south of Europe, are often omitted entirely from the account. A close approximation to the truth, in estimates which are sometimes studiously false, and which are generally necessarily under-rated, is impossible. We extract the following table:—

10,496,710,000 German dollars, equal to about 82 cents of our own currency.

Such is the aggregate debt of Europe; and the object of its contraction is fully equalled by the manner of its liquidation. With one exception, the boundaries of the European nations remain precisely as they were a century ago, when their treasures were still unincumbered; and yet, in attempts to alter or modify their bearings, in attempts to extend the French limit till they reach the Rhine, to consolidate the German confederacy, and to expand or contract the Prussian or Austrian dominions ten billions of money have been spent.—The partition of Poland, the only material change that has been wrought on the relative position of the great nations of Europe, was effected without the aid of a national debt; and of the wars which depopulated Europe, which broke down her commerce, which shattered her agricultural interests, which retarded, for more than a century, her advance in civilization, the only result has been a debt which will require a series of fresh revolutions to extinguish. Such is the reproductive power of war; and we fear that prodigies will be the sacrifice of blood and treasure, before the long account is closed. Who can guarantee that the revolution which may sweep away the present French debt, shall be less fearful than that which swept away the debt of the older Bourbons? In only two ways can the present incumbrances be removed; by extensive sacrifices, or by national repudiation. We trust that the days of the last alternative are run; and yet there is great danger that, should an extinguishment of the debt be attempted, in Great Britain, at last, the overburdened condition of the lower classes would produce general rebellion. On contingencies so disastrous, it is not our business to speculate. We pray that, by the interference of that hand in whose hollow are held the nations of the earth, the perils of the crisis will be averted.

BETTER TIMES.

We cannot but believe that the gloom and dismay with which the country has been covered for the past few years, is about being dispelled, and that an era of more general prosperity has commenced. The indications of this long wished for result are becoming too apparent to be mistaken.—Government stocks, that a few weeks since went a begging through the streets, are now thirteen per cent above par. Illinois bonds which lately sold at 16 cents, have gone up to 31, and those of other States, have experienced a like advance. From all parts of the country we have the most gratifying accounts of increased business and renewed confidence between man and man.

In what way is this to be accounted for? Is it not the result of salutary operation of the Tariff? We believe that it is. In 1811-2, when our Tariff was merely nominal, and afforded little or no protection to the industry of our country, the balance of trade was greatly against us, the custom house reports showed the exchange with England was very high. At the same time, most of the manufacturers had diminished the quantity of their work, and in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, and New England many stopped altogether, and thousands of workmen were thrown out of employment. This was the state of affairs when we had no tariff. Now, that the tariff is a gain restored, a bright day begins to dawn upon the industry of the country. The balance of trade is greatly in our favor, manufactures and workmen are being restored to their business, and large quantities of specie are coming to our country to form the basis of renewed credit. The price of produce of the country is beginning to rise, and our staple is looking up a little. All that is wanting to insure the increased and permanent prosperity of the country, is the restoration of a sound and uniform national currency, and the perpetuation of the present tariff, with such improvements as experience may teach, as are necessary.

It is for the people to say whether they will support by their votes, the men who sustain these measures, and whose aim and object is to restore the country, to that state of prosperity in which it was when the agrarian hand of Loco focism commenced its destructive work; or whether, not satisfied with the pressure they have already experienced, they will still further to paralyze American industry, and bring down labor and every thing else to a still lower standard. Let every man ponder well before he gives his vote, and let his influence in favor of a system which will compel an American Freeman to toil as hard, as long, and as degradingly, for the same compensation which is given to the miserable subjects of foreign despots.—Gulfian Gazette.

SONG OF THE IRISH LASS.

[From the Boston Bee.]
Oh I come from the land of potatoes and butter, milk;
Gem of the ocean, old Ireland far!
Where the girls all are lovely, and float
Butter silk,
To behead the charms that Dame Nature plants there.
For so soft as free as their faces are pretty—Whisper up the heart when they give up the land—
To tell a love story of a sweet ditty—
Now can I hear the dear lasses of sweet Ireland.
Then God bless the land of the harp-garlanded banter,
Thou land of the shamrock, the home of the brave,
And long may the blessed prosperity fan her, Sweet home of my heart and bright gem of the wave.
An alien I am from her own sweet domain;
But if I succeed in the scheme I have planned,
I shall return—and 'tis my opinion,
I'll take back a husband to old Ireland.
But if cruel fate should otherwise will it,
And I never should return to my mother's dear heart;
A tear still is here, and fate cannot still it—
That plays all the time for the land of my birth;
And when the death angel shall cease its vibrations,
And my body is laid low at my dread command,
Its last note shall sound for my absent relations,
And Heaven's best blessings on Old Ireland.

MARKETS.

Saint Louis, June 24.

Flour.—Since our last date a very active demand has prevailed, which the limited receipts have been insufficient to supply, and the consequence has been a further advance in price. We record sales on Monday at $3 1/2 to $3 3/4, and Tuesday for extra fine brands, at $3 1/2 to $3 3/4. Yesterday we heard of no sales, the market was nearly bare and several orders remained unfilled at the city mill that are holding at $3 1/2.

Wheat.—The demand continues brisk, but no change has been effected in the price since our last report. Sales have been generally made within the range of 60 to 70 cents per bushel, and to 60 to 65 cents per bushel, and 10 to 12 bushels were sold yesterday; the receipts are light.

Corn.—Very little is doing in this article. We noticed sales in sacks at 21 to 22 cents, sacks excluded; and one lot of 1,000 bushels on the cob at 18 cents. The demand is fully supplied by receipts.

Oats.—The receipts during the past week have fully supplied the demand, and sales are difficult at 17 to 18 cents.

Pork.—We have heard of no transactions during the week, but a fair demand continues with an upward tendency in prices. The receipts are very light, and are mostly forwarded.

We advance our quotations of last week of $6 75 to $7 for mess; or prime $5, which is now offered.

Bacon.—The stock in the market is quite light, and a brisk demand prevails for a well cured article in good shipping order. We quote sales of 20,000 lbs. hams and shoulders at 3 cts. and 30,000 lbs. at 3 1/2 cts. at 3 1/2 cts. for round in cases. Sales of hams we quote at 3 1/2 to 4 cts; sides at 3 to 3 1/2; shoulders 2 at 2 1/2 cts in bulk.

Lard.—No change has been noticed in the market for this article. Sales during the week being embraced within our quotations of last week, say 3 and 4 cents for all qualities, with a moderate demand. A choice article of leaf lard in clean packages would probably command a shade above our last figures.

On Thursday last, we quoted lead at $2 02 1/2 cts. We now place our figures at $2 05 to $2 70 at which prices several lots amounting to 3,500 pigs have been sold within the last two days. The receipts are still liberal, with a tall demand for shipment.

Hemp.—The market has been more active since our last, occasioned by purchases from foreign markets, which has enabled sellers to obtain an advance. We quote sales of good article at $2 62 1/2, $2 75, $2 87 1/2, and one parcel of superior quality in prime order at $3. The receipts are only moderate, with a fair demand.

An Ordinance to establish a Ferry across the Mississippi river at the City of Nauvoo.

Sec. 1. Be it ordained by the City Council of the City of Nauvoo, that Joseph Smith is authorized and licensed to keep a Ferry for the term of perpetual succession across the Mississippi river, within the limits of said city, on said river, bounded north, near the north west corner of section No. thirty-one, township seven north, of range eight west of the fourth principal meridian; and south near the south east corner of fractional section No. twelve, in township six north, of range nine west, of the fourth principal meridian, according to the charter of said City of Nauvoo, (which charter was granted by the State of Illinois, on the 10th day of December A. D. 1840,) embracing all ferries heretofore authorized by the State of Illinois, if any there be, within the aforesaid limits.

Sec. 2. And be it further ordained, that the said Smith shall furnish said ferry with a good flat boat, or a good boat to be worked by steam or horse power, and skiff, or yawl in such case, sufficient for the speedy and safe transportation of all passengers, together with their team, animals, goods and effects; and further, that said boat or boats shall be furnished with a suitable number of men, to manage them with skill and ability.

Lord Brougham, Governor Cass and America.

In bringing forth his vote of thanks to Lord Ashburton in the House of Lords on the 6th ult., Lord Brougham spoke with great severity of our late Minister in France, and took occasion to express his high admiration of our country. In the course of his remarks he said:

There was one man who was the very impersonation of mob-hostility to England. He wished to name him, that the name might be clear, as the guilt was undivided—he meant General Cass, whose breach of duty to his own government was so discreditable, and even more flagrant than his breach of duty to humanity as a man, and as the free descendant of free English parents, and whose conduct in all those particulars it was impossible to pass over or to palliate. Even after the adjustment had taken place, and after peace had been restored by the noble lord's exertions, as if some demon had whispered to him

This person, who had been sent to maintain peace, and to reside at Paris for that purpose after pacific relations had been established between France and America, did his best to break it, whether by the circulation of statements upon the question of international laws, of which he had no more conception than of the languages that were spoken in the moon—(loud laughter)—or by any other arguments of reason, for which he had no more capacity than he had for understanding legal points and differences, or by stepping out of his own province, and by mixing himself up with French affairs and the negotiation between France and England, with which he had no more to do than with any treaty between the princes of India—he did all this for the avowed purpose of breaking the state of peace between the two countries; for which he had been reprimanded by Mr. Webster.

And he had done all this, for what?—For the sake of furthering his own electioneering interests in America, and helping himself to that seat—the possession of which he coveted Mr. Tyler—the seat of the first magistrate of that mighty Republic. For that purpose he was not above pandering to the worst mob feeling of the lowest rabble of the United States. He (Lord Brougham) need scarcely say, that all the respectable persons in America were averse to a war with England; but he had taken upon himself to assert that wherever in that country they found a lawless set of rabble politicians, of inferior caste and station—a grovelling, groundling, set of politicians—a set of more rabble, as contra-distinguished from persons of property, respectability, and of information—in that quarter, among those more groundlings in station, among the rabble mob, they were certain to find the strongest and most inveterate prejudices against the union between America and England, and the greatest disposition to see war instead of peace between the two countries.

Then it was said that Lord Ashburton had, at a public meeting, talked of America as the cradle of liberty.

Lord CAMBRIDGE. Boston. Yes, and this was said to be a compromising act. But this was after the negotiations were over—this was the "song of triumph," to use an expression of his noble friend opposite on a former evening—(a laugh.) At this public meeting at Boston there was no business to be transacted, but it was held there for the purpose of celebrating the alliance remade, and the reconciliation re-estimated between these two kindred nations. He marvelled to hear the whigs object to any such proceedings at a public meeting, but above all to hear whigs, or a sort of whigs at least, (a laugh,) object to any thing that was said in favor of the cradle of liberty. He should have thought the very language was so sweet and dear to every friend of liberty that it might reconcile them to what might otherwise have appeared a breach of dignity and decorum.

Now there was other authority, and it was the last to which he wished to refer—that of our revered monarch George III. He did not consider that he stooped from his high degree, or that he adopted a truckling and unbecoming tone when in his reception of the first American minister who represented his revolted subjects and had therefore a most difficult task to perform—who first represented these revolted subjects at the court of their sovereign, whose allegiance they had shaken off, and whose sovereignty was known to have kept fast hold of his American sovereignty until it was wrested from his royal grasp. He took the opportunity of giving a most courteous reception and of saying—which was unnecessary, and needless though it was he thought fit to say—that although he was the last man in his dominions that consented to the independence of America, there was no man in his dominions that wished better to that independence, and felt more anxious for the prosperity of the new world. This was after the whole of the military proceeding had closed, as the speech of Lord Ashburton had been made after the negotiations had closed—(hear.) My lords (said the noble and learned lord,) I breathed the same prayer, which my late Sovereign expressed upon that memorable occasion. I hope and trust for the sake of America first; for the sake of England next—for the sake of humanity; of mankind at large—that the prosperity and happiness of that people will be perpetuated for ever.

My lords, I cannot view with indifference the magnificent empire which Englishmen have erected in that land, and my heart glows when I reflect that to England is owing that which America never scruples to confess she owes to England—those laws, those institutions—above all that spirit of liberty, of religious, as well as of civil liberty, which has made the American republic the greatest democratic nation that ever held existence upon the face of the earth.

There is enough to fill one with admiration, with hope, with exultation; but, in order to appreciate its merits, and to carry those feelings to their uttermost, it is necessary that we compare and contrast it with what has happened elsewhere, in other parts of the new world, where all the gifts of nature were not attended with the blessings of social existence. Look at South America, look at the events which have separated the Spanish colonies from the parent State, contemplate, for a moment, the rich abundance of natural blessings, of physical resources, of animal power of all that can make a people great, and prosperous, and powerful—above all, the gifts which ought to make them thankful to heaven—peaceful and contented with one another; their boundless expanses of space, diversified with every species of soil which can pour into their lap the produce of industry, or scent the air with perfumes, or enrich man by the wealth, the proverbial and unsurpassed wealth of minerals—every diversity of the most delicious climates, varying from the temperate to the torrid; every thing in absolute perfection, in abundance; these, the people of countless capacity, numerous, various in their race, from the industry of the negro to the swiftness of the Indian, and the ability, the practised ability, of the European and her descendants; all these rich treasures which Providence showered on them in such unmeasured abundance, had none of them sufficient to prevent anarchy from being enthroned there, had totally failed to secure the establishment of even the semblance of a steady, fixed regular republic.

But then turn your eye to the contrast, and compare them with North America, where you see men who—struggling with a hard climate, with, in many places, an ungrateful soil, their numbers small at first, increasing rapidly, becoming countless and spreading over a vast extent of land, had erected a system which was tried in every political storm, and struggled with success out of it, and above all came triumphant over the greatest tempest—that of the European revolution—which had ever laid waste human society. To what was the contrast owing? It was because the Spaniards did not carry out with them the blessings of a free constitution, or the practice or principles of civil or religious liberty, and because North America was crowned with all these political blessings. And if a passing cloud has come over them for a moment, and it is but for a moment—and if there should seem to be, and I believe it is only this semblance of any departure on their side, and in their conduct from those kind feelings and strict principles of religion and commercial honor and perfect national good faith which had always distinguished them. I have no more doubt than that I now stand here addressing your lordships, that that cloud will pass away, and that the Americans will once more, and in no long space of time, feel proud, and feel glorious in once more resuming their station—a station worthy their British descent, and of their British kindred—by feeling and acting as they have felt, that no stain should be suffered to rest on any part of their national honor. (Cheers.)

SANTA FE TRADERS SAFE.

By the arrival of the steamboat Weston, from the Missouri River, letters were received from members of the Santa Fe Trading Company—from one of which, dated at Independence on the 17 ult. we glean what follows: The writer arrived at Independence on the day previous, after a very unpleasant journey across the plains, not having had 24 hours of pleasant weather from the time of leaving Chihuahua. The spring had been very backward—the grass just beginning to show itself—and as the mules of the Company were almost without any thing to eat for twenty days, they were not able to travel more than eight or ten miles a day. The writer left the company at the Cotton Woods, (200 miles distant) and came in with a party of gentlemen who had been in search of the robbers of Mr. Charvis. Of the party of robbers, under Mr. Warfield, who style themselves "Texans," he says they saw nothing—although Mr. Gentry, on his way in from Santa Fe saw them at the crossing of the Arkansas four or five days before the trading company arrived there. "Our crowd," I think was rather "fuerte" for him; as we had forty wagons, twenty Americans, and about one hundred and eighty Mexicans, and kept a good look out all day, and a strong guard at night." It is stated, however, that the "ascals" were collecting in the mountains and will yet cause trouble. Four mountaineers joined the company at the Little Arkansas river, who saw Col. Warfield a few days before, and was told by him that he had then thirty-five men and expected a reinforcement from California, and about eighty men from Independence. [Ten of the latter, at any rate, he will hardly get.] He told them, as well as Mr. Gentry, that "America's property" was safe, if the owners did not join in and assist the Mexicans—a thing which they would most assuredly do, or be recreant to every generous impulse.

So far the letter. We have not been able to ascertain the precise value of property brought in by the Company; one rumor puts it at $180,000, another $250,000. We are glad at any rate, that it has not fallen into the hands of the freebooters—whether committing their depredations under the Texan flag, or that of the lawless robber, who has not even the commission from that redoubtable republic to justify such acts.

The Weston brought down six more of the men engaged in the Charvis affair—Dr. J. R. De Profontaine, Wm. Mason, N. H. Norton, Thomas Townson, Wm. Harris and Samuel S. Berry. They were immediately lodged in jail. As we understand that the five Mexicans who were in company with Charvis, at the time of the robbery, met with, and have come in with the traders, there will be no necessity for any unusual delay in the trial of the prisoners. Meanwhile, however, we hope the officers of the United States will feel themselves authorized to take such measures, by the employment of a proper guard, as will prevent the escape of either of these men, whether by assistance from without or insecurity in the jail. The jailor, we know, will do his duty, but "fast bind, fast find," is a wholesome regulation.—[St. Louis New Era.

Yankee Clocks in England.—The Birmingham (Eng.) Advertiser of the 16th ult., says:—"American clocks of very neat appearance and great utility, far preferable to the old Dutch ones, are among the manufactured articles which the new tariff has let in, and really seem likely to have considerable sale, without interfering with the sale of those of English manufacture."

Religion.—A very affecting sermon being one day preached in a village church melted all the congregation into tears excepting one man. After meeting he was asked why he did not weep with the rest, "Oh," said he, "I belong to another parish!"

Good Advice.

Quit your pillows, and go about your business if you have any—it is the first injunction; if not seek home. Let the sun's first rays shine upon your head in the morning, and you shall not want a good hat to defend you from its scorching rays, at noon. Earn your breakfast before you eat it, and the sheriff shall not deprive you of your supper. Pursue your calling with diligence, and your creditor shall not interrupt you. Be temperate and your physician shall look in vain for your name on his day book. If you have a small farm, or a trade that will support your family, and add a hundred dollars a year to your capital, be contented, and never run yourself bald in pursuit of State scrip and water lots in the West.

CHARITY.

"My dear Tom," said an exquisite to a brother idler, "How do you spend the twenty-four hours?"

"In charity!" replied the friend.

"In charity?"

"Yes," continued Tom. "Firstly, I give twelve hours to sleep—and of the remaining twelve I give two to dress—four to eating and drinking—four to the play or opera—and two to smoking and building."

"Building?"

"Yes—castles in the air; and I assure you 'tis a most agreeable pastime. And now what do you think of my disposition?"

"Equitable as 'tis amiable, Tom," replied his friend, "and I must positively take a leaf out of your day book."

Why on earth don't you get up earlier, my son?" said an anxious father to his sluggish boy—don't you see the flowers opening out of their beds at the early dawn?"

"Yes, father," said the boy, "I see they do, and I would do the same, if I had as dirty a bed as they have."

Hail Storm.—In Burlington county, N. J., on the 29th ult., hail of the size of pigeon's eggs, fell, it is stated, for fifteen minutes.

TEMPERANCE.

BY WILLIAM RODGERS.

Here we have met to give our aid my friends,
In that great cause that now our strength requires;
That happy day shall crush the source, that sends Forth o'er our land streams of devouring fires.
While every pleasure, every joy expires
Beneath its desolating, blasting storm,
And, ever sought, for happiness retire;
While fancied hope casts but a short liv'd gleam,
An anguish, and despair, its stern attendant seem.

The foaming goblets' fascinating glow,
Fly from it as you value health, and peace,
And happiness, for aiter 'tis a foe
To all that's good, to life, to wealth, and ease.
And shorten too, life's else uncertain lease,
And rob man often, of full half his days,
And bid the pulse that leads to honors, cease,
And makes him stoop to mean degrading ways,
Bartering for paltry gain, mankind's esteem and praise.

Taste not the drowsy contents of the bowl,
In whicher germs in its bright career;
It hath ruined many a gifted soul,
Whose giant spirits might have soared where
To scenes beyond that dark and narrow sphere;
Might have disclosed some source of learning here,
And stored up knowledge with each flying year,
Might have unfolded the book of nature's faith,
And taught mankind the things that deep hid hidden there.

Or by some deed of highest valor done,
Inspired by some high and noble aim;
Mankind's esteem, and love, they might have won;
Might seal'd the highest pinnacle of fame,
And won themselves never dying name;
Where freedom's gallant sign did proudly
wave,
Beneath which man to man, bows not in shame;
Might tread the path of glory with the brave,
That leads to deathless fame, or to an honored grave.

And yet they sold themselves for naught, for wine!
And stooped to taste the waves of woe;
And bowed to appetite's infamous shrine Souls that might've been aspired to bend below.
Yet can a pleasure from a goblet flow?
Or will it lighten this world's toil and strife,
Or soothe the pangs of bitter anguish? No,
It is abane to all that's dear of life,
And causes many a poor and broken-hearted wife.

Full many a sweet babe, fatherless has made,
And caused many a widow's tears be shed,
For faithless ruffian husbands' lowly laid,
To moulder in their last and narrow bed
To sleep for ever with the unhonored dead.
Unwept for by the world, they rest alone,
Who here did infancy, and sorrow weep,
And quenched each spark of promise'd hope that shone.

To revel in disgrace—forgotten and unknown.
A wretched life they pass—their pathway here
Is fill'd with unabating pain and care;
In a continued train of grief and dread;
No gentle feelings in their bosom thrill,
With all the soul of love affection chill,
In their unfeeling, cold, deserted hearts,
Where hate, rapine and murder this world fill,
Stung by a guilty conscience venom'd darts,
No blessings earth can yield—no pleasures life imparts.

To see its effects if there can be aught
It gives of joy—we have not far to roam,
See you'll find poor and miserable cot
The drunkards dwelling—'tis a wretched home;
A silent, cold and solitary gloom
Surrounds it, not a single sound
Of joy is heard; all's cheerless as the tomb—
No bright and merry faces there abound,
But blighted, woe worn looks, and wretched
neers is found.

No watch dogs bark—no little lounging child Is heard—no bright eyed maiden, neat and clean,
With looks of love, sweet, modest, meek and mild—
No buxom merry boys, may there be seen Casting each other o'er the level green,
In boyish sport, and youthful jollity,
But desolate is empty hall, I wren—
Ah! met what blighted hopes e'en there may be!

A house of bitter woe, and fearful agony!
There, sprawling on the floor, the father lies,
While many a breach, his clothes show gaping wide,
Headless of even love's endearing ties,
With a half empty bottle by his side
From whence flows follies, sin-inspiring tide,
While here, and there, a little ragged form,
Half starv'd, and shivering, may be espied;
With no bright blazing fire, to keep them warm.

While half a roof, scarce rears a shelter from the storm.
And there a poor, deserted, lovely wife,
Sits brooding o'er the varying scenes of woe,
That fill this vale of tears, and toil, and strife—
While down her cheeks, the tears in silence flow.
Yet speak the feelings, mothers only know—

Deposits, and riches, untold, sincere,
The bitterness of soul, with which they glow,
The grief of heart, for those she holds most dear Might make the sternest eye, to drop a kindred tear.
But drunken he, who should have been her stay,
Her comforter, her guide, and soothing friend
To lighten, and to cheer, life's darksome way;
And with its toils, and cares, sweet joy to blend,
And to its gloom, a sprightliness to lend—
And with his smile to gild each varying scene;
Of joy and we, and to every want attend—
And then a flow'ry path, would life have been;
And home would have been bright, and peaceful too, I wren.

Yet lies he there, who bears a husband's name,
(A title dear to every noble mind)
E'en dear to honor's voice, renown, or fame—
A man, a baited wretch, to glory blind,
And all that can exalt, or raise mankind—
His haggard visage, and his fardow'd brow;
(By dark unhallow'd thoughts full deeply lin'd)
Bears the unerring signature, I wren,
Of midnight revelry, and many a drunken row.

For the "Neighbor."

THE RESCUED BRIDE.

A TALE OF THE ALLEGHANY MOUNTAINS.

BY LYNN.

CHAPTER I.—THE CAPTURE.

On a fine evening in the latter part of May, in the year 1799, a carriage might have been seen rolling up the steep ascents of the Alleghanies; and then, like some proud ship, tossing up and down upon the restless billows, to descend, with rapidity, to the vales below, and lose itself in the redundance of their shades. This gliding vehicle contained a couple of happy lovers, riding out to enjoy the exuberance of the evening, and, as they proceeded onward their minds were filled with pleasing emotions as they contemplated the anticipated results of the morrow, which was to consum-mate their greatest happiness by the marriage ceremony. While their carriage rolled rapidly over the varie-gated cliffs, the smile of pleasure played upon their cheeks, and the soft music of nature, that sighed through the leaves of the trees, seemed to tune anew its joyful notes, as they passed, and welcome them on to anticipated bliss. While the fluttering zephyrs played upon the delighted ear, the evening orison of birds came floating through the air, soothing their minds into a state of perfect tranquillity.
Their whole thoughts were concentrated upon the morrow, and their minds employed in depicting, to each other, their high hopes of connubial felicity and the happiness they hoped to enjoy in the marriage association.
With these hopes high in their bosoms,
they rode on until the last golden rays of the receding sun had died upon the mountains and twilight had thrown its gray mantle around them.

While descending a long uneven hill, their attention was attracted by the deep solemnity that lingered round its base, and upon the dark valley below; the awful gloominess of which was not a little augmented by the towering desile of mountains that circled around it—lifting their haughty summits far into the sable heavens—as if to form a mighty and impregnable wall that forbade the flight of man. On descending to this gulf of gloomy shades, the fond couple were struck with a kind of solemn awe that silenced the hilarity of their conversation as they moved on in silence through the gloom. Day had long since departed—the dew began to fall thickly around, and, as the star-light came streaming through the vacant foliage of the trees, it could be seen hanging in glittering drops upon the overhanging boughs; and Carmelia, to avoid its chilling dampness, drew a light cloak mechanically over her shoulders and consoled herself with the hope of soon gaining her cheerful home.
But soon, alas! her hopes of home were blasted! While crossing a little rivulet that sent its serpentine windings through the vale—the lowmelancholly ripple of whose waters awfully blended with the solemnity of the night—they were accosted, in a peremptory manner, by two men, apparently in disguise, who sprang from an adjacent thicket and placed themselves in the road before them.

"Descend from this carriage and prepare to follow us!" was the command of one of them, in a low, yet firm tone of voice, at the same time fastening the reins in the clench of his strong hand.
"I owe no allegiance to highway-men," replied Calmer, sarcastically.

as he made a fruitless attempt to dash onward with his lovely charge.

The ruffian, incensed at this attempt to escape, levelled a pistol at his breast, which, on being discovered, was turned one side with the butt of Calmer's whip, and discharged without effect. In another moment Calmer had sprang from the carriage, and was rolling, bloody and mangled, with his competitor, upon the ground.

"That's it, old crone! deal him a-other round and wake him up about the short ribs, while I just turn my attention to this silly girl that's frightened out of her seven senses. Ha, ha, ha; I'm a lucky dog—always contrive to saddle the dirty work upon some one else, when there's a female in the case, who seems to need my attention," chuckled the other savage, as he turned with a supercilious air to the carriage. "By jupiter! she's as fair as the Hours! and her form would add a graceful lustre to the Queen's regal banquet! But, hark ye, fair one; this silly notion you have of swooning is not very becoming when a gentleman wishes to honor you with his company. By the powers! you look as though all the restoratives in the Royal Family's medicinal closet wouldn't make you sociable. That sweet-heart of yours was very ungallant to leave you thus unceremoniously; and seeing that you looked lonely I have come to take his place, and, with your permission, I will just drive off and leave the uncivil rake to go through a game of 'grand and lofty tumbling' with my old friend, Jack Swaghammer," said the eccentric Mr.
Dick Spindle; and the carriage was soon lost in the darkness of the night.
Thus, O, Carmelia! had thy calamities commenced!

CHAPTER II.—THE CAVERN.

"Chuffy!" said Jack Swaghammer, to a burly built fellow, who had just arrived at the scene of contest, "here's a chap rather unmanageable; and since Capt. Dick drove off his gal and his fine carriage, he raves like a madman.
So just lend us that cord with a little of your kind assistance, and we'll soon put him in a way that he'll not be quite so troublesome."

Calmer resisted with manly fortitude; but being overpowered by numbers his hands were bound behind him, when he was ordered to follow his captors, who led the way a short distance along the common road, and then turned off to the right, winding along upon the margin of a little stream for a distance of two or three miles, through intertwining underwood and over the felled trunks of interposing trees. Arriving, at length, at the base of a mountain, from whose side ledges of rock jutted out and hung with threatening aspect over their heads, the ruffians cast an eager glance around and then cautiously parted the boughs of a thick cluster of underwood that in arched, replacing them very cautiously after them as they entered.
They soon gained a narrow opening, which, after following a distance of nearly one hundred yards, led them to a concealed entrance into the mountain.
This entrance soon conducted them into a cavity or subterranean room, which nature's plastic hand had made as delightful and commodious as if the chisel of art had been operating upon its smooth walls and level floors. It was shaped in what might be called a circular or oval form, from the top of which, in the center, was suspended a large oil lamp, which, as it emitted its feeble light, disclosed the various paraphernalia of that murderous gang, which were profusely suspended along the gloomy walls. Here the two leaders halted, and, after holding a conference with each other a short time in an under tone, they approached a side door which they opened, and menacing Calmer to follow, they conducted him to a small apartment, where they left him alone to reflect upon his misfortunes.

"How reverse from hope are the casualties of fortune!" exclaimed Calmer, as the door closed and was fastened upon him. "But a few moments ago, dreams of coming bliss flitted across the bright vision of my imagination, and I seemed destined to a life of undisturbed felicity. But, alas!
when these anticipations were highest in my bosom, and I viewed with confidence the peaceful haven just within my grasp, the tempest broke over me with mighty celerity, tearing in a brief moment, my affianced from the very altar where she was to bestow upon me all her matchless charms and faithful heart; and I—O, fatal doom!—am the captive of a heartless banditti!"

"Ho, young man, how fare you?"
enquired a gruff voiced, bushy haired, double fist'd fellow, dressed in a coarse threaded round-about, grey pants, and a cloth cap that protruded out a considerable distance from his forehead, as he entered Calmer's cell the next morning. "I have the honor of being the bearer of a message to you, from one who always supreme authority here, to whose dictates it will be well for you to harken. Your bravery has pleased his fancy, which is his only motive in proffering the stipulations which I now offer. They are these. You are to join with us in our pursuit, (the nature of that pursuit, however, you cannot know until you consent,) swear allegiance to our compact, and exert all your abilities to promote our interest.
These, in short, are the terms we offer.
We do not compel you to give an immediate answer—two days grace are offered you. During that time you are to remain here, without refreshments, at the lapse of which,
if you do not consent, sterner measures will be adopted—death will be your portion! Consider well! and mark ye, this decree is fixed and unalterable! You cannot escape our power! These walls are impenetrable—our bolts are stubborn—our eyes are vigilant—our force is formidable!"

The ruffian disappeared—Calmer was alone.

Those two days of utter hopelesness—of keen despair—had passed.
The captive sat, pale and haggard, upon his lowly couch. The huge door swung upon its hinges, and his uncouth visitor again entered.

"Say, pale boy, does your sumptuous living drive you to consent? Ha, ha; you could not long survive upon the vapors of these damp walls. A more substantial diet is spread in another apartment, where I grow fat and corpulent, and my friends make mercy. Have you decided?" enquired he insidiously.

"My hands shall never be contaminated by such an unholy alliance. I choose the other extreme of your stipulations—death!" said Calmer, assuming a calm and resigned attitude.

The ruffian turned upon his heel, muttering to himself, as he disappeared, "To-morrow morning shall seal your doom!"

CHAPTER III.—THE DISCOVERY.

By the dying embers of what had been a comfortable fire, sat the father of Carmelia. He was evidently considerably agitated, and filled with fearful forebodings. The clock told the hour of midnight—he rose alarmed and paced to and fro the lonely room.
He listened to every noise that he might catch some sound of his daughter's return; but in vain. Some ca-lanity must have befallen her—she had never before absented herself from her home to so late an hour.
She was the ministering angel that attended to the little cares of her aged father—her sainted mother had left her in charge of her domestic affairs, and that charge she performed with alacrity and attention. She was the only object that bound her parent to this troublesome world—the only link that united his affections to earth, and he witnessed with alarm every little incident that afforded a possibility of an accident befalling her.
As the night waned he continued, at intervals, to pace his room and sit in thoughtful silence. Morning at length dawned—she had not returned—no tidings had been received. The sun mounted high in the heavens—still she returned not.

"Pappy De Benion," said a little girl running into the room with a fresh rose in one hand and a doll in the other,
"here is a sweet rose I just pulled for sissy Carmelia, to wear to-day when she is married to brother Calmer. See, Pappy's what a nice doll Carmelia gave me yesterday, and said
I must keep it to remember her by when she was married. Pappy, has Carmelia gone into her room to dress for the wedding? Let me take her this rose—I'm sure she'll like it—it's such a nice one. When all the grand folks come, poor little Nett can't talk and laugh with her, so let me go to her now."

This simple and youthful prattle of the lovely little girl filled the old man's bosom with a thousand reflections upon human life. The days of youth—so full of hope—so free from care—so unacquainted with the ills of man's existence—so ignorant of the vicissitudes—the cares—the disappointments incident to maturer age—were all brought before his mind and filled his contemplations.

"What makes you look so sad, Pappy? Has Nett offended you by her noisy little tongue?" enquired she, looking up into his face with all the earnestness of youthful simplicity and childish innocence.

To prevent paining her with the truth, he assumed a cheerful air, took the little girl upon his knee, repeating the thousand stories he had so often told her, and then getting hot to sing, in the wild but musical strain of her yet untutored voice, some of the innocent songs that Carmelia had taught her.

While this tele-a-tele was going on,
some old acquaintances were announced.

"Ho, old friend," said a familiar and joyful voice, "how fare you! Is the young brile prepared for the solemnization of the sacred rite? I see no preparations—the house seems quite deserted and desolate, and instead of its being filled with the invited guests, congratulating the young bride, it is deserted by all save yourself and that happy little babbler upon your lap.
What explanation have you to offer?"
continued he, patting him upon the shoulder.

The old gentleman was now driven to an explanation, which caused a tear to tremble in Nett's eye, and the intruder to look grave.

"They surely would not be so un-courteous as to disappoint so many of their old friends, were it in their power to prevent it. There is a mystery here. Come, friends, let's set ourselves about unravelling this secret. An enquiry must be made," said the stranger, turning to his companions. They soon departed on their search, and little Nett, with a sorrowful heart (if that young heart was susceptible of sorrow), ran home to tell her mother all she had heard.

"The girl knows that horseman?" enquired one of them as they approached the gate, "he is riding in this direction in a great hurry."

"News from Carmelia," articulated De Benion, with his eyes sparkling with earnestness.

In a few moments the horseman approached, handed De Benion a retic-le which he informed him he picked up in the road in a deep valley, some ten miles distant, and, finding the handkerchief it contained bore the name of Carmelia De Benion, he had repaired immediately there to bestow it upon the right owner. "The place where I found it," continued he, "was considerably trodden with foot-prints, and some drops of blood was visible upon the ground."

Dark forebodings flashed across the minds of the whole company. The father's heart was filled with the most intense anxiety for his child, yet he remained calm and collected, and betrayed no sign of emotion, except in the occasional altering of his voice and the involuntary quiver of his lips. An alarm was immediately spread, and the whole neighborhood was soon on their way to the mysterious place, that they might if possible, discover some traces that would give them a clue to the fate of the two absentees. After a hasty march of some two hours they arrived at the spot, and found everything as had been represented. The foot-prints, the wallowed ground, and the drops of blood were all visible, but no further signs could be found. All else was a dark and fearful mystery.
The whole country was scoured, the wilderness was ransacked, every mountain scaled, and every cavity and secluded place, which could be found,
was entered; but all to no purpose.
The sun had set in the plenitude of its glory; but the destiny of the absent was not known. The night fled away —slowly and tediously to the alarmed neighborhood—the morning dawned again upon the world—and the mystery had not been unravelled. During all that day the search was prosecuted with eagerness and assiduity; the sun was again preparing to bid them adieu, and spread the sable curtains of night over the hopeless scene. At that hour young Cargil—an active young man who was noted for his adventures in the forest, issued from the woods in breathless haste and approached the dwelling of De Benion. The house was crowded with men just returned from the fruitless search, who were endeavoring to console the father by every favorable coloring their ingenuity could invent.

"Listen, men," said Cargil, in a fur-ried voice, as he entered the house,
"and I will relate a discovery which may prove an advantage to this old man. I have been in search all day to learn the fate of the absent, and have made but one discovery. This you may call a frivolous one; but for my part I am not disposed to treat it thus lightly. I have long believed this settlement to be infested with a gang of highwaymen, and I hope the news I am now about to communicate will lead to their detection and ultimately disperse them. Some two or three miles distant from the main road where the young lady's reticle was found, I was pursuing my search this evening, and being very much fatigued
I seated myself upon a shelf of rock that hung pendent from a mountain.
While thus seated, in that prominent position, viewing every surrounding object, and contemplating the wild irregularity of the scene around, my attention was attracted by the seemingly impenetrable thicket below me and the horrid solemnity that appeared to hover over it. While my attention was thus engaged, I saw a man of very suspicious appearance standing close to the base of the mountain, on nearly a perpendicular line below me, who seemed startled at every sound that fell upon his ear. I noticed him for some time with interest, my curiosity being considerably excited by his suspicious demeanor. Willing to run some little risk, if for no other purpose than to give him a fright, with a slight motion of my foot a stone was detached from the shelf which fell with a heavy crash near the place where he was standing. The savage leaped into the air with alarm, gave a full blow of his breath, or a kind of half whistle, and then darted back into a small entrance which appeared to lead into the heart of the mountain. In a few moments he returned accompanied with several men of the same suspicious appearance. They cast around a furtive glance as they approached;
but not finding any cause for fear, save the stone that had fallen, which they concluded must have been jostled from the shelf by some natural impulse, not being able to discover me, they began to amuse themselves at their comrade's groin-dies alarms. In a few moments they all returned, and I hastened to inform you of the singular discovery."

"No time is to be lost—this very night we must hear them in their den!" exclaimed the individual who the day before interrupted the old man's tele-a-tele with little Nett. "No doubt but his fearful cavern contains the treasures for which we have so faithfully searched.
In a short time a large company was paraded with all the various paraphernalia of war which the neighborhood could furnish, and on their way to the mysterious place.
"Cargil, can you guide us to the entrance without much difficulty?"
enquired the father of Carmelia, as they arrived at the thicket of underbrush, which we have previously mentioned.
"Have no fears; I know every inch of the ground—discovered the secret path, which, in this bright moonlight, can be easily followed. See—see—here—there—come on—softly—that's it—here's the cavern—now we're safe," continued Cargil, as they moved through the thicket and entered the mouth of the cavern.
[TO BE CONTINUED.]

The old man and the youth.—Goron, an aged sire of eighty years, sat before the door of his country seat, and enjoyed himself in the serene autumnal morning.
Soon his eyes rested on the blue mountains in clouds from sacrificial offerings;
upon the blooming grandson who played before him. There came, at that moment, a youth from the city to the old man and whispered at his happy and robust age, and fresh countenance.—
The stranger acknowledged to him his surprise, that he should enjoy such strength and serenity; and asked him the reason. Then he raised himself up and led the stranger into an orchard; he pointed him to the high and stately trees, so full of delicious fruit, charming to the heart. Whereupon the site said:—"Wonderest thou that I now enjoy the fruit of these trees?
Behold, my son, I planted them in my youth. They have here, the secret of calm, fruitful old age." The youth bowed to the sire; for he comprehended his words and took them to his heart.

RECOLLECTIONS OF THE CLOSING SCENES OF THE LIFE OF GEN. HARRISON.

That dream of 1841—how swiftly has it passed away! What a period in the history of our country! The first time I ever had a full view of William Henry Harrison was when he alighted from the cars in Washington a few days before his inauguration. He was dressed in a plain great coat, and common black hat, (white was a favorite color of Jackson,) and appeared in great simplicity—much indeed like a farmer President. Although the snow was rapidly descending, a vast crowd surrounded the car house, and filled the adjacent broad avenue, ever and anon sending the air with their shouts of welcome, as the old general (refusing to ride) walked to his prepared lodgings, holding his hat in his hand, while his venerable head firmly (as in other days) received the peltings of the tempest. It was a sublime moment. It was a beautiful commentary on the nature of our republican institutions. It was a renewed and noble demonstration of the spirit of our constitution. Nor was it the homage of once-expectants. It was the outpourings of the hearts of the people.

It was animating indeed to see the red pendant, with the names of the nineteen States inscribed in white upon it, stretching in the form of an inverted arch across the width of Pennsylvania Avenue, and along with it the star-spangled banner, triumphant in many battles on the land and on the sea. Gen. Harrison was exceedingly gratified with the powerful vote given him. So was he with the character of many of his voters. I once observed to him I had understood the clergy of N. York generally voted for him. "I am pleased to hear that," he replied, "and so did the ministers of Cincinnati." The population of Washington was never so transported with an all pervading enthusiasm on the arrival of any preceding one of the illustrious line of Presidents. When Jackson came from the Hermitage and appeared in Washington, in obedience to the summons of that overwhelming majority which could never be reversed, there was much enthusiasm among strong politicians and brave soldiers, but the affections of those that met and mingled in society with him did not leap forth as when Harrison stood before them. Many were the hearty exclamations bestowed on the hardy cheek of the old general by matronly virtue and virgin purity. He appeared the venerated and beloved father among kind and devoted children.

The day of the inauguration was cool and raw. Long before twelve the people began to assemble in immense numbers. They were from every part of the union. The president elect having taken the oath of office, the thunder of cannon announced the fact in the ears of the people. Then followed the inaugural address, which, long as it was, was uttered in clear, audible and powerful tones, such as probably never before proceeded from a President. That mental and physical exertion in the open air, on a cold March day, in the midst of such intense excitement of feeling, continued for nearly two hours, and, followed by the subsequent congratulations of the day and the occasion, was enough to cripple the strength of youth. How could an old man sustain it? Excitable as Gen. Jackson is, in the very essence of his constitution; phlegmatic as Gen. Harrison was believed to be; on the august occasion of the inauguration of each, the former appeared as tranquil in spirit, as he was inaudible in enunciation; the soul of the latter seemed roused with the fire of patriotism, as if it had been kindled anew by the breath of popular applause, when, as he was crowned with civic wreath, the shouts of thousands welcom'd him as the patriot President of the republic.

If we may pursue the contrast between these two eminent men, viewed in various lights, truth will authorize us to say, that while the Hero of New Orleans was impetuous, irascible, irresistible, the Hero of Tippecanoe was cool, good natured, persevering. Both were affable and communicative; but while Jackson was more courtly Harrison was more abrupt. While the latter would not willingly offend the humblest citizen, the former was more indifferent what impressions he made, especially if he was vindicating any violated point of his character.

Both loved their companions in arms, were grateful for favors, but far from being equally sensitive to the severity of impeachment from the tongue of rumor. An accusation that would drive Gen. Jackson into a paroxysm of indignation, would only begin to stir the sensibilities of Harrison. Boldness, ardor, a burning patriotism, characterized the one—caution, resolution the other. The moral was probably equal to the military courage of each. Neither understood fear. Neither gave up hope in the darkest crisis. Neither could tolerate blunders, weakness, or wavering, when the enemy was nigh. Jackson could never speak of Bladensburg with patience. "With that old mill," said he, "on the bank of a river for a fort, and four hundred men, I would beat the rascals off." He declared that all the Americans wanted was a leader and some discipline. Both these men reposed, after the storms of war and the fatigues of a campaign, with deep delight on the bosom of domestic love. They were fond and devoted husbands. As the departed wife of the one is held in sacred remembrance by her husband, so the departed husband of the other is cherished by his surviving widow, in whose affliction a nation was afflicted. As intellectual men, they were both strong; but while education had polished the mind of Harrison, it had done little for that of Jackson. In literary composition he is quite deficient, while Harrison was the best bellettrist scholar and the most popular speaker in his class at college. The full, strong, and voluminous voice of Harrison was heard by 30,000 people at his inauguration. Probably not 500 heard that of Jackson on a similar occasion. In money matters the one was free, generous, even prodigal. The other is careful, saving, just before generous, abhors beggars, and thinks it dangerous to encourage them. Harrison would eject from his pocket the last eagle for the destitute and suffering. Like Monroe, Harrison could not die rich—Like Van Buren, Jackson would with the greatest difficulty die poor. In the bosom of both, love of country burned with indistinguishable ardor, and they constitute, like Washington, each the rare case of the highest office in the world seeking in. The one, apparently feeble, outlived his double presidential term, emphatic and disastrous as it was; the other, apparently strong, died on the very threshold of his labors and responsibilities.

What an event was that death! It thrilled the heart of the nation. When it was announced to the astonished people, who was not taken by surprise?

Those that were distant from the scene imagined many things. Those that were near saw and felt things almost surpassing imagination. There might have been a deeper sublimity in the grief of the people, as the melancholy news travelled from city to city, and from village to village of this fair land, but its strength and ingenuously could not be greater than in the hearts of those who were near the departed President; who had expected from him no favors, and who were doomed to no disappointment. The people, both old and young, crowded around his coffin, as in solemn majesty the body reposed in the ante-room of the white house. No soldiers, no sentinels were necessary. Of the thousands who visited that room, all seemed under the influence of a secret, silent, invisible law, proceeding from the Providence of God, that dispensed with the necessity of all human vigilance. The chief of seventeen millions of people had fallen. Death could do no more! Many were the early, blooming flowers laid on the bier by the hand of affection. Many the natural tears shed over that illustrious form. I saw some of the plainest and poorest, that appeared to have lost a father and a friend. With those that were near, it seemed not so much the death of the President as of the man yet "a prince and great man" in our political Israel.

The funeral—was there ever such a one! The nation went into mourning, on that day. No gorgeous externals were needed to excite public attention. The simple velvet coffin with its precious charge was borne along in the centre of that immense procession of the fourth of March. Then rushed upon the mind a series of contrasts. How different from the inauguration day! Then the joyful roar of the artillery welcomed the living chief. Now the solemn minute guns proclaimed the funeral honors of the illustrious dead. Then the national banners streamed aloft to the winds of heaven. Now they were furled to the staff, and bound with the badges of mourning. Along the whole length of the main avenue, the white handkerchiefs waived from a thousand fair hands greeting the President elect as he passed on the fourth; but now they who held them looked on in fearful silence. The spirit-stirring notes of the bugle were heard on the one day; on the other, the wail of the martial trumpet, as the body was removed from the house. This procession of thousands was not moving to the Capitoline Hill, to install the chosen leader in his great office, but to the mansions of the dead, to entomb his mortal remains where the cares and honors of the state are alike unknown. I could not help calling to mind, the lines of Thomas Campbell on the funeral of the Princess Charlotte of England—

"Sad was the pomp we on that day beheld,
As with the mourner's heart the anthem swelled;
The rich-plumed canopy, the gorgeous pall,
The sacred march and sable vested wall;
These were not rites of impetuous show,
But hark! as the types of real woe:
Revered patriot! for a nation's sighs,
A nation's heart went with those obsequies."

There is one peculiar salute for the commander in chief of the army and navy, as his body is carried to the tomb, which was never before paid since the foundation of the republic, and which will not be again unless a President should die while actually invested with the robes of office. It is of course the highest known to our military institutions. Its style of execution, as on this august occasion, is grand and imposing. And he who directed it—Alexander Macomb—the General in chief—was himself not long after laid in his lowly bed. "The patios of glory lead but to the grave."

For the Neighbor,
LIGHT AND SHADE.

BY LYTON.

When e'er the heart is fill'd with gloom,
And o'er the world's broad bosom broods sad sorrow;
Soft thro' the soul's deeps a ray will gleam—
To-morrow's dawn may be all gladder.

When e'er our humble lot we mourn,
And weary heartache's sad we sorrow;
Come, and, from the dark picture turn,
A brighter sun will shine to-morrow.

When day transforms itself to night,
And each sad hour brings disappointment;
Far thro' the gloom steals on our sight
Some star, to heal, like "holy ointment."

When our frail bark seems but a wreck,
And doom'd to sink on fate's dark billow;
Some light will, thro' the darkness, break,
And guide us to some "downy pillow."

Hanged himself.—The papers state that on the evening of the 23d of April a Millerite preacher in Canada, was so vexed because the end of the world did not come the straight-way he hanged himself. Don't believe it.

The following papers will please copy the advertisement—"Nauvoo Ferry"—in our fourth page, and charge to us—Springfield, Register; Dayton, Western Empire; Indianapolis, Indiana State Sentinel; Peoria, Register. Publish 3 months.

THE NEIGHBOR.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 14, 1843.

Business seems to be progressing in our city, buildings are being raised in every direction; and all of the citizens manifest a determination that Nauvoo shall be built.

The Temple is improving fast; the stones of that building begin to rise tier above tier; and it already begins to present a stately and noble appearance.

The day being unusually fine, last Sabbath, we had a large concourse of people assembled at the Temple; the floor, as well as the walls, were literally covered with people. Mr. Joseph Smith delivered a discourse, in the morning; which was listened to with great interest by the congregation. The Rev. Mr. DeWolf, an Episcopal Minister, who by the way, seems to be much of a gentleman, delivered an address in the afternoon; we heard nothing very objectionable in his discourse; of course he is not a Mormon; his pontifical robe however seemed rather unique to many of the Latter Day Saints who had not been accustomed to a priestly garb; we heard some of our fair ones remark that his gown would make a good dress for a lady.

It will be seen in another column, that our old esteemed, and much respected friend, Judge Higbee, one of the Temple Committee is dead. It is unnecessary for us to add any thing to the remarks already made by our correspondents; they are just and appropriate. Suffice it to say that he was a good Christian, an affectionate husband, a tender father, and a faithful friend; he was a living monument of the truth and beauty of the gospel he espoused, and died in the full triumph of faith, and in the hope of a glorious resurrection; and we may add with the apostle—"he being dead yet speaketh." He has left a tender wife, an affectionate family, and a large circle of friends, by whom he was esteemed, and respected, to mourn his loss. Peace be to the ashes of the man of God.

There has been a great debate in the House of Commons (England) on the Washington Treaty negotiated by Daniel Webster and Lord Ashburton; it was moved by Mr. Hume and supported by others that a vote of thanks be given to Lord Ashburton for successfully adjusting these differences that had existed long between this country and England. The motion was strenuously opposed by Lord John Russell, Lord Palmerston and others, but eventually carried by 238 against 96.

Since the Hog law was passed some of our good citizens have begun to bristle up, and two or three petitions with a small number of signers were presented to the City Council last Saturday for its repeal; but the City Council seemed determined that the swinish multitude should be kept within proper limits, and not mingle among "humans." We believe the law gives general satisfaction; and we have been informed since the question of repeal has been agitated, that should such an attempt again be made that petitions would be got up having thousands of signers, praying for its continuance.

O hogish law! how cruel! thy decree,
That will not let the swinish hordes run free,
To break down fences, and as lords of soil,
Flow up men's gardens, and destroy their toil;
But has decreed, by a most cruel fate,
That hogs and humans, shall not amalgamate;
No squealing grunting, roasting, can be here;
If should be free, thy freedom seek elsewhere.

The Baltimore Sun, says that "every dollar that is expended in advertising, will yield five dollars to persons in almost any business. Do you hear that, ye sinners!"

Passed June 10th, 1843.
JOHN TAYLOR, Pres. pro tem.
JAMES SLOAN, Recorder.

Vermont Sugar.—It is estimated by the Montpelier Watchman, that the maple sugar produced in that State the present season, at the low price of five cents per pound, will amount to $1,000,000. This will make the quantity of sugar about 20,000 hhds. In 1840, the quantity was but 5500 hhds.

The number of barrels of flour exported from the U. States, for the year ending September 30, 1842, was 1,539,647, of which 833,225 barrels were sent to Great Britain and her colonies. During the same year we exported 889,585 bushels of wheat, of which 850,915 bushels were sent to British ports.

A Curious Fact.—The London Herald in the progress of an article upon the manufacturing skill in the United States, asserts that rails for at least one half the English railways have been imported from the United States, and every one knows that all or nearly all the railroads in this country, are laid with rails brought from England. This we presume is reciprocity.

Seizure of an American Vessel.—An American Fishing schooner, the Washington, was seized on the 10th. off Annapolis, N. S. and carried into Yarmouth, N. S., for an alleged violation of the treaty in regard to the right of fishing vessels.

True Philosophy.—I saw a mourner, stand bending over the tomb, and his tears fell fast and often. As he raised his humid eyes to heaven, he cried,

"My brother! oh, my brother!"

A sage passed that way and said,

"For whom dost thou mourn?"

"One," replied he, "whom I did not sufficiently love while living; but whose inestimable worth I now feel!"

"What wouldst thou do, if he were restored to thee?"

The mourner replied, "that he would never offend him by an unkind word, but he would take every occasion to show his friendship, if he could but come to his fond embrace."

"Then waste no time in useless grief," said the sage, but if thou hast friends, go and cherish the living, remembering that they will one day be dead also."

Sentence of Death.—Thorn, the murderer of Mr. Wilson, at Brunswick, was sentenced at Portland on Thursday to undergo one year's imprisonment and then to be executed.

A Large Pear Tree.—Some of the western papers speak of a pear tree in Knox county, Indiana, near Vincennes, which measures, one foot above the ground, ten feet in circumference, and has a top sixty nine feet in diameter. It was planted some thirty-five or forty years ago; by Mrs. Ockletree, and bears almost every year about one hundred and thirty-five bushels of choice fruit!

Old Age.—There is at present residing on Little Annamassex, in Somerset County, Md., a hearty, fine spirited old gentleman, named Hance Lawson, who has reached the extreme old age of 110 years. He a few days since walked a considerable distance to pay a visit to his youngest son, a lad of about 70 years.

That Kiss.—Norah O'Brien, all blushing and sighing, came forward this morning as gay as a lark, against Bob McCarty, a lad stout and hearty, who ventured to take a sweet kiss in the dark. Norah's cheeks were as red as a fresh plucked tomato, and her heart full as soft as a mealy potato; and after a sigh that would shake a church dome, she told how that Bobby had kissed her at home. "Ye honor," said Norah, "I tell it with sorrow, one evening last week, as I sat in my door, young Bobby came over quite decent and sober, and did what I never saw him venture before; for his arm very slyly he stole round my waist; while a kiss on my lips the young rascal impressed." "An sure," says he, "Norah, there's no harm in that." "Oh no Bob," says I, as I hit him a pat; "but if Terry should know it, I venture to say, the devil intirely would be to pay." "Och, niver mind Terry," says Bob, "sure, you know he's breakin' uv rocks in the alley below." "True enough," says myself, and the minute I said it, troth another big kiss on my cheek sure he made it, and although I giv him a thump in the side, faith the devil a bit could I make him desist, but just as he stooped for to kiss me again, faith in popped my Terry, wid two other men, and druv Bob intirely away from the door, and told him niver to come there any more. Then off for a warrant for Bobby he came, and brought me up too, which in troth is a shame; for ye honor excuse me, I'll stop this minute, I'm thinken quite serious that nothing is in it."

The recorder seeing that Norah was quite as willing to be kissed as Bob was to kiss her, told him to go about his business. Bob performed an expressive gesture, by placing his thumb on his nose, and twirling his fingers, while Terry looked daggers and stooped, swearing that if he caught Bob on his premises again, he'd play the devil with his countenance.

We get this bit of information from the St. Louis Gazette. Sure Norah must be cruel to bait (beat) poor Bobby for a kiss.

The National Debt.—The unpaid debt amounts to nearly 800,000,000 sterling, a sum not so easily comprehended as expressed in these words. But if we look forward to the year 2000 of the Christian era, and back to the birth of Christ, and further back 2300 years to the flood, and further back 1700 years to the Moslem, and the date of the creation of man, then the whole date will amount to 6000 years, and the debt is equal to a dollar a minute during the whole of the time, reckoning each dollar at five shillings value. Well may we stagger under the load.—Liverpool Mer.

Busts.—These critics and Gen. Jackson's busts, are rather convenient after all the talk. They afford a subject for printers to harp on; they help the dry goods merchant, (they say cotton is rising in these parts,) and more than all that, they make a lady's form look a little better than God intended they should.

More of the Somers case.—Wells, the informer, on whose evidence young Spencer was condemned, has been discharged from the Naval service of the United States! A rumor of a very painful nature (says the New York Herald) is in circulation, concerning one of the principal officers of the Somers! Eugene Sullivan (the lad who had Com. Perry held to bail last winter, for having him ironed a second time, contrary to the decision of Judge Greenwood) has been discharged, no proof whatever of his being guilty of a mutiny having been discovered.

The first D. D.—Rev. Increase Maier was the first person who received the honorary degree of D. D. in this country, which was conferred by Harvard College in 1692. Since then, as is justly remarked by the Exeter News Letter, these degrees have so multiplied and have been bestowed so indiscriminately, that it is almost doubtful, in many cases, whether D. D. might not as appropriately be considered the abbreviation of Dull Dunce, as of a Doctor in Divinity.

A Juvenile Devine.—It is stated in the Baltimore papers, that the Rev. T. Evans, sixteen years of age, was to preach in one of the churches in that city.—[Exchange paper.]

Poor boy! When he arrives at years of discretion, he will see the folly of preaching, (if his silly advisers do not spoil him entirely) and renounce it, we hope for some useful business.—[Investigator.]

If a man be compassionate toward the afflictions of others, it shows that his heart is like the noble tree that is wounded itself when it gives the balm.—[Bacon.]

American Liberty of Conscience.—Every man has a right to think and talk as he pleases, provided he thinks and talks as the Church directs. This is the true definition of American liberty of conscience.

Diderot. on his death bed, was urged by the curate of St. Sulpice to recant his opinions. "I know," said Diderot, but will it do to tell a downright lie?"

Christian Morality.—In a certain court a will was offered for probate; and the only living witness to its validity was an infidel. A member of a Methodist church undertook to contest its validity, as, by destroying it, he would become an heir at law, though he had no claim under the will. He succeeded in his attempt by causing the witness to be discredited on the ground of infidelity. He subsequently acknowledged that there was no man living on whose veracity he would place more perfect reliance, than on his whose testimony he had called in question, and which the court, in consequence, had rejected. The Methodist professor took possession of the property which the former owner had bequeathed to another man, as he had a perfect right to do his will. This is a true story, and place and names could be given. The reader is requested to decide with whom dwelt the morality.—with the Christian, or the Infidel?

Singular Coincidence.—The ship Caline, Fabens, from Canton, and the ship Alert, Phelps, from San Diego, California, both arrived at this port on Thursday evening—one from the far East the other from the far West. They both sailed on the same day, Dec. 30th, and spoke each other 21 days before entering this port, and on enquiring the longitude of each other, the one gave 61 1/2 the other 61 1/2; an instance of agreement in dead reckoning, after so long a voyage, seldom known among nautical men. The respective passages were performed in 125 days.—[Boston Paper.]

Accident.—The following disastrous occurrence on the Boston and Worcester railroad; yesterday afternoon, is another admonition against the practice of walking on railroad tracks: As the 3 o'clock train, for Worcester was approaching Angier's corner, at a distance of about half a mile it ran over and instantly killed an aged man, named Bilson. The engineer gave every alarm, but no attention was paid to it.—[Daily Advertiser.]

American Products in France.—Considerable alarm, it is said, prevails among the French agriculturists in consequence of our sending to that country great quantities of lard, butter, salted provisions, wax, clover seed, &c. which have been delivered there and sold with the duties paid at lower prices than they can be afforded in that country. The Chamber of Commerce of Moulais has taken this subject into consideration.

A Negro Burned.—In the western part of Missouri, near the Choctaw line, the Indians murdered a man by the name of Cox. A negro, who was a participant, fled with the savages to the Indian country, but were overtaken, brought back, and delivered to the civil authorities. They confessed that they committed the crime. It appears, from their statements, that the Indians shot Mr. Cox, and at the report of the gun Mrs. Cox ran to the door, and the negro knocked her down with an axe and killed her, and then killed a small child and cut its head off. They then robbed the house, and found something like a thousand dollars. They were placed in jail; but the populace became so much enraged that they went to the jail, and took the negro out, tied him to a stake, and burned him to death.

An honest fellow was introduced into the most fashionable circle of a country village; and though he was neither learned nor brilliant, yet he passed off very well. But he had one incorrigible fault; he always staid so as to be the last person who left the room. At length he was asked categorically why he was always so long. He replied, with great good nature and simplicity, that "as soon as a man was gone, they all began to talk against him; and consequently he thought it always judicious to stay till none were left to slander him."

A man cannot possess any thing that is better than a good woman; nor anything that is worse than a bad one.

"I would rather not take a horn now," said a loafer to a mad bull; but the bull insisted on it, and the loafer got high.

A Jewish Synagogue has recently been dedicated in New Haven.

A lady in France had the habit of picking her teeth with pins. A trifling humor was the consequence which terminated in a cancer. The brass and quicksilver used in making the pins will account for the circumstance.

"I say Jemmy, lend me your last paper." "I can't do it; you know you wouldn't lend me your new coat 'tother day, you know." "Nonsense—that's another thing—only want to read it to the ladies." "Can't come it, Jerry—I only wanted to wear your coat to go and see the ladies."

A procession was taking place at the church of St. Genevieve, for the purpose of obtaining dry weather. The pious people had scarcely reached the square, when it began to rain with great violence. "Never mind that," said the Bishop, "the Saint mistakes us entirely—he thinks we have been praying for wet weather!"

A drone in society should be as rare a phenomenon as in a hive of bees; and it is hardly going too far to say, that, when found, he should be treated in the same manner.

Did you ever know a scolded minister to have a "call" to preach to a poorer congregation?

A New Doctrine.—A man in Boston is lecturing on the art of living without sleep. He has set an example of fifty-two months, and declares it to be a first rate plan. So we must prepare ourselves, we suppose, to have another new doctrine equal in monstrosity and folly to that of Mesmerism. Do without sleep! Pooh! Nonsense!

Burning of the Louisville Theatre.—This building was set on fire in several places. It was owned by S. Drake, and not insured. Fifty or sixty dollars, the proceeds of Saturday night's performances, were stolen from the manager's room during the fire.

Stocking Murder.—We learn from the Pittsburgh Post of Saturday, that a constable in Allegheny city, named Bowden, came to his death, the day before, under the following circumstances. "A ruffian from up the Allegheny had promised certain creditors here that he would pay them his debts this Spring in lumber. Yesterday they learned that he had passed the city with a raft and had went down the river. They employed three constables, and sent them in pursuit—they came up with the ruffian, who had stopped some few miles below, and Bowden was proceeding to the execution of his duty, when the man picked up an axe and killed him at a blow."

"Is it possible, Sir," said a gentleman, addressing a young fellow, "that you whipped an old man like that?" "Whipped him!" exclaimed the young fellow—"I'm only nineteen, and can whip a man as old again as him at any time!"

Woman's Rights.—Major Toolman, the Polish exile, in a recent lecture said: "During the war with Russia, even the Polish women were engaged in raising forces, and taking command of them." One was created a Colonel, another a Captain, others Lieutenants, and in one instance a lady was 2nd Lieutenant of a troop in which her husband was 2nd Lieutenant and subject to her command!"

Drunken Ned came home one night and having reached the centre of the room, down he fell flat. "Wife," said he, "what did you grease the floor to night for? you have made it so slippery I can't stand on my feet!"

Brutal assault upon a Young Lady.—The Boston Bee details the particulars of a most brutal assault upon a Miss Austin, respectfully connected, by a scamp named W. H. Glover. Miss A. was proceeding home alone from a neighbor's house in the evening moonlight, when the brute stepped up to her, and struck her a blow upon the temples that felled her to the pavement. The villain then knelt over her, and while strangling her by his grasp about her throat, tore her clothes from her person, and doubtless would have succeeded in an infamous attempt upon her virtue, had he not been alarmed by the noise of the freight train arriving from the Eastern Railroad. He fled immediately.

She succeeded in reaching her father's house, shrieking, in frightful accents, "murder! murder!" Glover was captured, and she recognized him as the villain. Miss Austin's face was literally pounded to a jelly—one of her eyes completely closed and her nose broken. The enormous swellings upon every part of her face rendered it impossible to discover the extent of her wounds. Her head was cut in several places, her lips cut to her teeth, and her throat and neck disfigured by the attempted choking. Such was the excitement in East Boston, where the poor sufferer was beloved by every one for her meek disposition and many virtues, that the people would have torn the ruffian limb from limb but for the protection of the police.

Foreign.

Five days later from England.
ARRIVAL OF THE CALADONIA.

AT BOSTON.

The steamship arrived at Boston on Friday the 19th, bringing news to the 5th inst. The overland mail from India had not arrived. Nothing of importance.

The Queen is doing finely, that is, up and doing again.

THE INFANT PRINCESS.—Her Royal Highness is a remarkable fine infant, not so delicately formed as her sister, the Princess Royal, and in features more resembling the Prince of Wales. She has light blue eyes and hair which promises to be flaxen.

Theatricals were never known to be so low an ebb. Bunn kept Covent Garden open until his treasury was exhausted, and with the exception of the Italian Opera there is not a theatre in London paying expenses. In the provinces, the same depression exists—the best proof of the poverty of the middle classes.

The Emerald had arrived at Havre.

Intelligence had been received from the Islands of Marquesas which state that the French Governor and suite had been murdered by the natives. P. W. Byrnes, Esq., long connected with the packet ship between Liverpool and New York is dead.

The Havre Theatre was destroyed by fire on Friday night, the 28th ult. Mr. Porter, the manager, who resided in apartments attached to the theatre, lost his life.

There is every prospect of a very early and very abundant harvest this year. From the midland of the winter, the wheat was more forward at the beginning of April than it usually is at the end of that month, and the abundant rains and a occasional genial weather which we have since had have caused it to advance, notwithstanding a few checks from frosty nights.

A second edition of the Chronicle contains the following extraordinary express from Paris:

PARIS, May 2.—The affairs of Serbia are arranged. The Duan has conceded all the demands of Russia. Prince George is to abdicate, his counselors and Krima to quit Serbia, and a new election to take place, probably in favor of Prince Milosch.

An attempt was made at Milan to assassinate the Viceroy, which failed.

THE CHARTIST TRIALS.—O'Connor and the other Chartists, tried at the Lancaster Assizes, together with White who was tried at Stafford, have received notice to appear at the Queen's Bench on Thursday, May 4, to receive judgment.

The celebrated danseuse Fanny Corito, accompanied by her father, arrived in town on Saturday from Milan, where she has been "starring" during the winter alternately with Taglioni. Adele Dumilatre returns to the Academie Royale at Paris.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, May 3.—The House met at four o'clock, when a good number of petitions were presented against the educational clauses of the new Factory Bill and the Corn Laws. The House, at its rising, would adjourn until Friday, in honor of the Duke of Sussex's funeral.

In reply to Mr. Borthwick, Sir R. Peel stated that there was no intention on the part of either England or France to place unnecessary restraint on Don Carlos; but at the same time, they thought that no unqualified liberation of the prince would interfere with the tranquility of Spain.

BRITISH PARLIAMENT.

Nothing of interest had occurred in the British Parliament, except the debate in the House of Commons on Tuesday night, arising out of Mr. Hume's for a vote of thanks to Lord Ashburton, in connexion with the treaty of Washington. The motion brought up the ablest men on both sides of the House; but the subject has been worn thread-bare by previous discussion, and its novelty has passed away.

A Chartist meeting at Hull was recently dispersed by the authorities, and the orator on the occasion seized and bound over for trial on a charge of sedition.

Latest accounts from Naples state that Vesuvius was again belching forth large quantities of flame and smoke.

There is no particular change in the state of trade. Dullness seems to prevail through almost every department.

CHINA.

The Salem, (Mass.) Register contains the following extracts of letters by the Mary Ellen.

CANTON, Jan. 15, 1843.

The Clipper "Anonyma," arrived from Calcutta about the 5th inst., in the extraordinary passage of 31 days, up the China coast, against the monsoon, bringing part of the October mail, by which we learn of the imposition of a tariff.

The "Natchez" arrived a day or two since in 42 days from the West Coast of America—the shortest run on record.

The soldiers were withdrawn from the front of the factories several days since, and in their stead we have now some 50 or 100 Hong Coolies, valiant men, all ready to run away in our defence. No danger, however, is apprehended. Elepho has arrived, and his presence, it is said, will be sufficient to restrain the mob.

Nothing has yet been done in way of negotiation, and little or nothing about indemnity claims of losses. Pottinger is still at Hong Kong with—Com. Kerney, lying at Macao Roads, in the Constellation.

We have appealed to him, but what he will do in the premises no one knows. He keeps dark.

A most atrocious act was committed a few days since by the local mandarins. Our Cooley, a fine young fellow, who stood up during the whole of the row, was sent for by the Namhoi, to be interrogated on the subject. They wished him to say that the house was fired accidentally, and not by the mob, in order that they might make use of his evidence to evade paying the losses. On his refusal to do this, he was handcuffed across the face, and kept in prison several days. This, too, by the mandarins who evaded such a laudible activity in flying to our rescue on the 7th.

CANTON, Jan. 12.

A few days since, as Capt. Cecille, and some other officers of the French frigate Erigone were walking near Macao, they were attacked by a band of Chinese, and Capt. C. was very roughly handled, receiving a terrible wound on the head, and other damage. The frigate has come up to Whampoa and Capt. C. is here to demand satisfaction for the insult.

On Sunday last 8th inst. an awful affair took place near Macao. A Lorch belonging to Capt. Sharpe, while on her way from Whampoa to Macao, loaded with the druggist was attacked near the Nite Islands, and Capt. S. together with Mr. Wilson, Ten Taster for Messrs. Turner & Co. two English sailors and four Manila men murdered, the cargo stolen, and the Lorch set on fire and burned up.

The Hypochondriac and the Press.

There was a Squire Foxall, a martyr to that melancholy humor called Hypochondria, and who was cured by the Press. Many a serious scene there was between the master and his man Roger, a confidential servant of the old school, shrewd, trusty, and as blunt as a spade.

"Well, Roger," the master would say, after a very long and solemn shaking of his head, "I am going at last."

"Glad on it—to Swaffham in course?"

"No Roger, no—to another world."

"What to America?"

"No, to another and a better one, Roger—to the land of spirits."

"Ah, that's along o' mislan your brandy—you be low, you be."

"Not so low as I shall be, Roger. I'm at death's door; I have double knocked and am scraping my shiver, and it will soon be, walk in. Now, Roger, remember when I'm going that Mr. Bewley—"

"Yes, yes, I know. He have got the best of your last wills. Your navy will come into the land, and your niece is to have your personal books."

"No, Roger, that was the will before I've made another since then; but no matter. I've done with money and land. All I require now is a little turf."

"Well, there's a whole stack on it if the dick yard, and when you've burnt out that—"

"Never Roger, never! I'm burnt out myself—quite down in the pocket, and shall go off like a snuff. I am ready, Roger, for the garner."

"Yes, yes, and corn for the sickle, and grass for the scythe, and a ripe plum for the basket, and brown loaf for hopping the twig. I know all that by heart."

"I'm a dying man, Roger, and you know it. I haven't twelve hours to live—no, not six, before I pay the debt of nature."

"Dang the debt o' nature! I wish you had none to settle but hern. But it ain't due yet, it ain't."

"Due and over due, Roger. The receipt's made out, and before to-morrow you will have another matter."

"No, I shan't. I shan't had no warnin'."

"But I have, Roger. Here feel my pulse. It stopped just now for two minutes and a half. The circulation is at a stand-still—the heart cannot perform its functions."

"All moonshine, master. Its performing its funkings at this minute. It's going as regular as an eight-day clock; I can almost hear it tick."

"No, no, Roger, that's impossible."

"Is it? Then why do Doctor Darby try to hear it with his telescope?"

"Stethoscope, Roger—Stethoscope—There may be hyperthoracy for all that. But you know I can't argue with you. My lungs are quite gone, you feel."

"No wonder—you've been blowin' 'em up this ten years."

"They're destroyed, Roger. Pulmonary consumption has set in."

"Yes, yes, I know they're full of tubercles."

"Tubercles, man, and my liver is in no better state."

"No—they're schismatic. And you've got an abscess in your inside—"

"An abscess."

"Well, an abscess in your stomach, and can't digest properly for want of gas and water."

"A deficiency of the gastric juice. It is all too true Roger. Every organ I have is out of order."

"Then I wouldn't play on em! Well, what next? Why, you've got a gathering in your lumbering progresses."

"Lumbering progresses—"

"Which in course affects the head, and so you've got a confusion of water on the brain. Then you've had an electric fit, and there's your stertorous ague, and the intermediate fever—"

"Intermitting."

"Then, there's the inflammation of your muscous members—"

"Membrane, membrane."

"Well, membrane. Next there's your vertebra headache—"

"Vertigo."

"And lord knows what in your intestines and viscerae. Then there's your legs with various veins—"

"Varicose."

"And as to your feet, what with hopping in them—and flying gout in your stomach—swimming gout in your head—you're gone all over."

"Yes, Roger, yes; it has got hold of my whole system, sure enough. But I'm appy I'm afraid of—apoplexy, Roger; I have giddiness, tinnitus, congestion, lethargy, every symptom in the book!"

"Larg the books—it's them has done it! There's Doctor Linny's Family Physician; you've got to give yourself over ever since you brought it home. And then there's Doctor Winslow's book, and Doctor Prankum's as made you believe between 'em, that you'd got turned head and a pendulum belly—"

"Pendulous, Roger."

"Well, it's all one. And then their plaguy formuluses for making up your own prescriptions. You'll prescribe yourself into heaven, you will some day, with your blue pills and hydragra powders—"

"Hydragra powders."

"It can't be good for nobody to swallow so much calumny. And then your dabbles with them deadly poisons, though you know as well as I do, that three Prussian Acidulated Drops would kill a horse."

"You mean Prussic acid. But in some affections, Roger, it is of great service."

"Yes, like Oxonian acid, for boot-tops. Then, there's the newspapers. I do believe there ain't a quick medicine advertised, but you've tried 'em all, from Colley's Antibiting pills, and the Pebrifuges, to Sarcy Barilla. Lord! lord! the heaps of nasty messes you have swallowed surely!"

"Not to forget the Horse Phisic you took after residin in Doctor Elliotson that the human two-legged specious could ketch the glanders!"

"And was the poor man cured of his Hypochondriasis?"

"Yes, by the County Chronicle, into which some wag introduced an announcement of his sudden demise, 'after a complication of disorders borne for a long series of years with unexampled cheerfulness and resignation.' The effect on the patient was marvellous! Instead of damping his spirits or shocking his nerves, it set up his lumbagoed back, roused his sluggish spleen, stimulated his torpid liver, stirred his lethargic lights, warmed his congested blood, till it boiled a gallop, and turned his flapping heart to a Cour de Lion. He declared loudly that the piragraph originated in political spite—swore that it intended as a hint for his assassination, and vowed that he would horwship the Editor of the diabolical newspaper in his own infernal office."

"And he was as good as his word—for which practical sincerity he had to unhandred pounds for damages, and as much more in costs. His old affections vanished as if by magic; and now his only complaints in the world are of the impudence of counsel, the partiality of judges, the stupidity of juries, and the uncertainty of the law."

POETRY.

THE FIRST.

BY FRANCES BROWN.

The first, the first!—oh! nought like it
Our after years can bring,
For summer has no flowers so sweet
As those of early spring.
The earliest storm that strips the tree
Still wildest seems and worst;
Whate'er hath been again may be,
But never as at first.

For many a bitter blast may blow
O'er life's uncertain wave,
And many a thorny thicket grow
Between us and the grave;
But darker still the spot appears
Where thunder-clouds have burst
Upon the green, unlighted years—
No grief is like the first!

Our first-born joy—perchance 'twas vain!
Yet that brief lightning o'er,
The heart, indeed, may hope again,
But can rejoice no more.
Life has no glory to bestow
Like it—unfallen, unaccursed;
There may be many an after glow,
But nothing like the first!

The rays of hope may light us on Through manhood's toil and strife,
But never can they shine as shone
The morning stars of life;
Though bright as summer's rosy wreath,
Though long and fondly nursed,
Yet still they want the fearless faith
Of those that bless'd us first.

In first love deep in memory
The heart for ever bears;
For that was early given, and free—
Life's wheat without the tares.
It may be death hath buried deep,
It may be fate hath cur'd;
But yet no later love can keep
The greenness of the first.

And thus, whate'er our onward way,
The lights or shadows cast
Upon the dawning of our day
Are with us to the last.
But, ah! the morning breaks no more
On us, as once it burst,
For future springs can ne'er restore
The freshness of the first.

SONG.

Her voice came o'er me like the notes
Of music's softest flow,
As when on early morn't floats
From hill, or dale below.

Her locks were like the raven's wing,
Her forehead pale and high,
Her smiles the smiles of opening spring,
Her breath the zephyrs sigh.

So light was her fantastic tread,
She seemed to scorn the ground,
And floated down the dance instead,
With one seraphic bound.

Her eyes, the pure ethereal blue,
Her lips, the ruby's glow,
Her blush, the rose's sweetest hue,
Her bustle filled with tow!

For the "Neighbor."

THE RESCUED BRIDE.

A TALE OF THE ALLEGHANY MOUNTAINS.

BY LYTON.

CHAPTER IV.—THE CONFLICT.

'Twas midnight. All was as silent as the chamber of death, and no sound was heard to break the stillness of the night, save the low, monotonous music of the cricket's watch-song, which proceeded from the damp walls of Calmer's apartment. Pale, haggard and motionless, he remained upon his couch, as if riveted there by some mighty spell that seemed to stupify and paralyze all his physical energies.
The very fountains of his soul seemed turned to dust—his fevered cheeks were moistened not by a tear—his heart alone sought alleviation in the up-swelling expanse of his bosom. The past—the present—the future—were before him in his mental vision; and the words burned like fire upon his heart: "TO-MORROW MORNING SHALL SEAL YOUR DOOM!" And Carmelia!
where was she? Ah! this was a dark and fearful mystery! Did she occupy any place in his meditations? Oh!
how gladly would he have died, to rescue her and restore her to friends and happiness!

Now the heavy tramping of men was heard upon the rocks, the sound of which echoed along the spacious apartment, which Calmer had first entered, with a kind of hollow moan that struck terror to his heart. Their steps drew nearer and nearer and numberless voices were heard in loud and animated conversation. Suddenly was heard a fierce yell, like the cry of battle, and anon came the roar of musketry and the clang of contending arms, which were terribly mingled with the screams of the wounded and the groans of the dying. Now a heavy noise was heard at the door, which burst open, when the ruffian, who had previously visited Calmer, darted into the room, with a drawn battle axe in his hand. He was evidently in the act of striking it into the breast of Calmer, when his arm was arrested by an individual who followed close in the rear;

and who, in another instant, levelled a well directed blow at the savage who fell at Calmer's feet, rolling and tumbling with maddened fury and tearing himself convulsively, until his lips were purpled with the thrill of approaching dissolution and the cold chill of oblivion was settled upon his frame. Thus, the interposing hand of Providence—always sure, though sometimes slow, in the administration of justice—had wrested that fearful sentence from the head of Calmer, and placed it upon the heartless bandit.

In a moment more, Calmer was in the arms of his deliverer, and that deliverer was the father of Carmelia!

"Where is Carmelia?—my own—my only daughter?" enquired the old man, casting an anxious glance around the room.

Being informed of the manner in which she had been taken away, the old man seemed to gather a new accession of strength, agility, and renewed spirit of determination. Calmer, inspired with a hope of escape, aroused all his dormant energies; and fastening the arms of the dead man upon his person, they rushed forward to the assistance of their friends and mingled in the work of slaughter with a fearlessness and determination that inspired the hearts of their friends with confidence and enthusiasm, which enabled them at last to drive the enemy from their den.

CHAPTER V.—THE BURIAL.

At the house of the deceased De-Benion was assembled a large congregation, who met to pay the last tribute of respect to their departed friends.
In the center of that congregation were placed six coffins, each covered with sable pall, that fixed the impress of deep solemnity upon the scene. Silence reigned supremely there, except now and then when it was broken by the deep drawn sighs of the mourning multitude. Each countenance was sad and sorrowful, which betokened the irreparable loss with which the neighborhood had met. Widows mourned the loss of husbands—children wept for their departed parents, whose tears mingled together over that imposing spectacle. Soon that silence was effectually broken by the melodious chant of the funeral hymn.
Then rose the Clergyman, who, after invoking the blessings of heaven upon that afflicted assembly, poured forth the feelings of his soul in a torrent of eloquence, dealing arguments of comfort and consolation to the bereaved ones, until they almost "forgot to mourn." Did that speaker, in the excitement of his discourse, with his hand up-raised to assist the fervor of his declamation, forget to mention the lamented Carmelia? No—you stricken one—that address was interlarded with pathetic appeals to awaken the vigilance of the people in your behavior, your innocence—your loveliness—the care with which you watched over the necessities of your bereaved parent, were all portrayed to the minds of that assembly. When he closed, the coffins were opened and the friends crowded round to take the last look of the dead.

At that moment, a little girl, ten or twelve years of age, was seen darting through the crowd; and, running to the coffin of De Benion, she said, in a sweet voice: "Here, Pappy De Benion, is the rose I picked for Carmelia's wedding day—it's a little withered now; but that makes it a better emblem of Nett's heart. Here—there—now Pappy—'twill look so pretty when they put you down in the cold ground," said little Nett, as she fastened the withered flower in the bosom of the snowy shroud.

The coffins were now closed and placed upon the hearse, which moved slowly on, in solemn majesty, followed by a long procession—of both sexes —who went to consign the remains of the dead to the "narrow house." They arrived, at length, in a shady and luxuriant grove—covered with luscious flowers and spring's brightest green —through which a purling stream mildly rippled—sending its babbling music in discordant melody around—and there, in that sequestered spot—so redolent with balmy fragrance—so rich with nature's dulcet warblings—
the coffins were lowered into the graves—the sexton's cord was drawn up with a kind of hollow, grating sound—the monotonous rumble of the earth rose upon the graves—succeeded by the rapid patting of spades, and now nothing remained on earth of the deceased, save the legacy of affection they had left upon the hearts of a sorrowful people.

"Mammy, when my other Pappy died, did they put him down in the ground, too, like Pappy De Benion?"
"Yes, my child!"

"Will little Nett ever see Pappy Morton any more? Poor Nett's got no one to care for her now but you and Calmer! Poor Calmer! how sad he looks!"

This conversation was here interrupted by the forming of the procession, which moved on towards their homes; but one form still lingered by the graves, pale and languid in its appearance. He knelt upon the grave of his intended father-in-law—tears dropped from his cheeks upon the fresh earth, and his bosom heaved with intensity of emotion. There, over that grave, he asked his Heavenly Father for consolation, and implored the intervention of his power to restore Carmelia to his bosom.

CHAPTER VI.—THE MISER.

At the mouth of that fatal cavern,
in one deep grave dug for the purpose, were thrown the dead bodies of the ruffians, over which was erected a rude block of wood, bearing the inscription of "THE ROBBER'S GRAVE," which name the place retains to this day.

CHAPTER VII.—THE PRISONER.

Two days of sorrow had passed with Carmelia, and the third night of her imprisonment, had clothed the earth with its sable mantle. It was midnight; yet she still lingered by her bedside, her fevered eye-balls refusing to court the refreshing balm of sleep.
She had slept but little during her imprisonment, and tasted little or no
refreshments. As the flickering rays
of the nearly extinguished candle fell upon her pale and wan physiognomy,
she had more of the appearance of some spectre from the tombstones of antiquity, than of a human being. Yet,
to the credit of the Miser, be it said that every attention was shown her
and every restoration provided.

Whether this resulted from his miserly disposition to secure the lucrative patronage of Spindle, or a feeling of real pity, is not quite certain; but Car-melia sometimes thought that it emanated from a benevolent motive. This might have been the case; for what heart—however sordid in its inclinations—however lost to feelings of humanity—however hardened against the pleadings of pity—however unmoved to sympathy by human misfortunes—would not be aroused from the cumbrous folds of worldly sensuality, and touched with the penetrating sting of humanity, when daily witnessing the languid countenance, the drooping form, and the mental agony
of one so lovely—one so amiable—one
so refined and courteous in her manners—one so much to be admired by every lover of beauty and virtue, as was the stricken and fast fading Carmelia—
While thus lingering by her bed-side,
she heard heavy and repeated raps at
the outer door, accompanied by the hurry and clamor of many voices. The old man lay as still as a dog in his kennel until he heard "Toland" reiterated by the intruders, which was evidently the secret word of recognition.

cove, that here is a nice little article, which I wish to deposit here for safe keeping, and as you are the redout-able landlord of this Inn, I will just place her in your possession, expecting that you will put her in a place where "thieves cannot break through and steal!" interposed Dick, turning to Carmelia, at the same time putting her hand into that of the Miser.

Carmelia was now usher'd into another apartment of the house, which was small, but neatly furnished, into which there was no entrance save the one through which she had just been conducted. The Miser now placed a lighted candle upon the stand, pointed to the bed, telling her kindly to retire when she felt disposed, and then retired from the room, very carefully locking the door and putting the key in his pocket.

"Hark ye, old sinner," said Dick,
as the Miser returned, "one hundred pounds in gold is yours if you will keep this girl safe one week, one half of which I will pay you now, and the other half will be due at the expiration of that time."

"You are a liberal customer, master Dick, you always pay well; but I have good accommodations and you know I am always ready," said the old man, placing a very great emphasis upon the last word.

"It's better to be trusty than to be food for the buzzards; but here, I've got the fifty counted out, and now I must go to secure this fire-dragon that is waiting so patiently for me. He is a noble animal and will yet do honor to the chase in Count M——'s Park.
He will soon travel to the ship and then he will have a fine sail over to the Madeira Isle. Ha, ha, old cove, he will take a good pill from the Count when I get him there. If this silly girl was't constantly going away into such troublesome swoons, 'twould save me the trouble of coming back after her; but it's better to have some trouble than miss the shiners; ha, ha, ha," and his boisterous laugh echoed through the rooms long after he left the house.

The old man clutched the gold con-sulsively from the table; and followed at a rapid pace until they reached the carriage, and as Spindle mounted into the seat and was about to whirl rapidly away, the old Miser articulated enquiringly, "fifty pounds more?"

"Yes!"

"In gold?"

"Yes," and Dick Spindle was soon out of sight.

The Miser rung his lean hands in an ecstasy of delight, and returned to his house.

CHAPTER VIII.—THE PRISONER.

Two days of sorrow had passed with Carmelia, and the third night of her
imprisonment, had clothed the earth
with its sable mantle. It was midnight; yet she still lingered by her bedside, her fevered eye-balls refusing to court the refreshing balm of sleep.
She had slept but little during her
imprisonment, and tasted little or no
refreshments. As the flickering rays
of the nearly extinguished candle fell upon her pale and wan physiognomy,
she had more of the appearance of
some spectre from the tombstones of antiquity, than of a human being. Yet,
to the credit of the Miser, be it said
that every attention was shown her
and every restoration provided.

Whether this resulted from his mis-
erly disposition to secure the lucrative patronage of Spindle, or a feeling of
real pity, is not quite certain; but Car-
melia sometimes thought that it emanated from a benevolent motive. This might have been the case; for what heart—however sordid in its inclinations—however lost to feelings of humanity—however hardened against
the pleadings of pity—however un-
moved to sympathy by human misfortunes—would not be aroused from the cumbrous folds of worldly sensu-
ality, and touched with the penetrating
sting of humanity, when daily witnessing the languid countenance, the drooping form, and the mental agony
of one so lovely—one so amiable—one
so refined and courteous in her manners—one so much to be admired by every lover of beauty and virtue, as was the stricken and fast fading Carmelia—
While thus lingering by her bed-side,
she heard heavy and repeated raps at
the outer door, accompanied by the hurry and clamor of many voices. The old man lay as still as a dog in his kennel until he heard "Toland" reiterated by the intruders, which was evidently the secret word of recognition.

They entered considerably excited and breathing hard with fatigue.

"What means all this hurry and business, this sudden and untimely intrusion?" exclaimed the Miser as they all drew seats around the hearth upon which one of them kindled a small light.
"I'm afraid it's all over with our speculations in this quarter, old partner!" replied a voice from one corner of the fire-place.

"Routed, horse, foot and dragons!"
exclaimed another.

"Our holy citadel is stormed and given a prey to wild beasts," insinuated a third.

"The crows may make their nests
there—the sliding lizard may plaster its loathsome slime upon the walls—the panther may cower there with her young; but it will never again be a mart for the money trade or a retreat for plunderers," chimed in the fourth.

"Blood and thunder," roared a fifth,
"but that chap we had caged there for the last two days fought like a brag-lion in the Roman Amphitheatre. And that old man that fought so desperately by his side, had the story told for him, by my broadsword; the last I saw of him he was bleeding in the arms of that young son of thunder, who exclaimed 'De Benion!' as he fell into his arms. If the unmannerly knaves had watched their homes until the next morning, the bravery of this lad would have done but little harm to us in the way of a fight. Ha, ha, ha, what say you, Jack Swaghammer?"

"I say if I had Dick Spindle by the foretop I'd ring his rascally neck for driving off my gal, after I got that gallant of hers engaged in a warm round of fist-cuff," replied Jack drily, at which the company fell into a hearty roar of laughter.

"Silence you unruly dogs! if you are escaping from the enemy you had better keep a little more quiet, or the devil a bit of protection will a warm fire and these frail walls afford you!" exclaimed the alarmed Hermit at the top of his voice. "You'd better be thinking of paying this old man for your lodgings than to be going on in this way."

A shilling a piece was now donated, the old man chuckled involuntarily at its sound and grasped it tightly in his hand.

In one half hour they were snoring soundly round the hearth, and the old Miser carefully opened the door that led to Carmelia's lodgings, expecting she had overheard the tumult and become alarmed. His fears were well grounded; she had heard the whole of the conversation; and was overcome with emotion.

"Oh! my father! my father! shall Carmelia never see thee more? He died in the arms of Calmer! Would to God it had been my lot! Oh! how sweet it would have been to fall asleep on his bosom where I could feel the warm throbs of his faithful heart! Farewell dear father! It was sweet for you thus to die! May God protect your afflicted daughter, preserve her from the inclinations of wicked men, restore her to the home of her childhood and to Calmer, and at last give us a seat with thee to enjoy the beatitude of heaven!"

These words were so impressive, the last sentence of which was spoken in such an imploring attitude, upon her knees, in that dim light, with her face up-turned to heaven, and her slender hands elevated, that the heart of the Miser, strong as was his desire for money, seemed to betray some feeling of pity and emotion, as he stole softly and unperceived from her room.

Foreign.

FIVE DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The Steamship Caledonia arrived at Boston yesterday morning at half past 5.
By this arrival we have Liverpool papers to the 4th, and London to the evening of the 3rd.

There is no particular change in the state of trade. Dullness seems to prevail throughout almost every department.
There is no change worthy of notice in the London Money Market. Consols maintained their price, though the market for them is heavy.

The Overland Mail from India and China due the first week in the month, had not arrived.

The Queen of England and the infant
Princess were "doing remarkably well."

The Duke of Wellington completed his 74th year on the 1st inst. and gave a Levee on the occasion.

A very extensive seizure of tobacco had been made at Belfast, by the chief officer.

A man was arrested in carrying off the contraband article by the railroad.

It was stated that nearly 500,000 persons had passed through the Thames Tunnel since its completion.

Richard Arkwright Esq., the richest commoner in Europe, died recently at his seat in Derbyshire.

The late earthquake was quite severely felt at Moscow, and caused much alarm amongst the inhabitants.

A woman of Coulon recently gave birth to a child with only one eye, no legs, and one of the arms without a hand. The child was in good health.

A Chartist meeting at Hull was recently dispersed by the authorities, and the orator on the occasion seized and bound over for trial on a charge of sedition.

A plot for overturning the government of Tassin had been defeated by the Piedmontese government, which seized at Arona a large quantity of guns and amunition which had been sent from Lombardy.
Latest accounts from Naples state that Vesuvius was again belching forth large quantities of flame and smoke.

A notary had fled from Orleans, leaving a deficit of 500,000 francs. He was supposed to have gone to England.

M. Kaumartin, the lover of Mlle Heinforter, the German singer, was recently tried for the murder of his rival, M. Sirey, and acquitted.

A large number of tenants on the Blenheim estates in Oxfordshire had quitted their farms—and dissatisfaction among the tenants of England, on account of the high rents, was growing daily more apparent.

A series of murders, of the most extraordinary and revolting character, have been brought to light in Bedfordshire. A woman is charged with having been instrumental in the death of her husband and one child, by administering to them arsenic in their food.

Three families in the county of Donegal in Ireland, had been poisoned by eating of the dahoe, or death root, supposing it to be parsley.

A woman of fortune and most respectable connections, named Maynard, has been committed to the Brixton jail for a series of petty thefts. 8000l. in Bank of England notes were found in her possession.

The King of Naples had taken the occasion of the birth of a daughter to grant an amnesty for all offences of a second ary character.

An extensive seizure of flour, belonging to a Kentish miller, has been made in London, with which bone dust was mixed and the miller subjected to a heavy fine.

A wild bear was lately shot in the Forest of Raubling, in the Vosges, which weighed 615 lbs. Nearly 1300 shots were fired at him, and he killed more than fifty dogs.

A man named Walsh has been arrested at Monmouth, charged with the murder of a man named Cleary, more than thirty years ago.

By the returns, nearly complete, of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, is fully ascertained that a complete revolution has been made in the character of that body, and that the schismatics had been entirely defeated.

The celebrated danseuse, Fanny Cerito, accompanied by her father, arrived in town on Saturday, from Milan, where she has been "starring" during the winter alternately with Tagliani. Adele Dumil-atre returns to the Academie Lyale at Paris.

A great Anti-corn Law Conference was advertised to be held in London on the 9th May, to which deputies had already been appointed from all parts of "the Three Kingdoms."

The Infant Princess.—Her Royal Highness is a remarkable fine infant, not so delicately formed as her sister, the Princess Royal, and in features more resembling the Prince of Wales. She has large light blue eyes; and hair which promises to be flaxen.

BRITISH PARLIAMENT.

Nothing of interest had occurred in the British Parliament, except the debate in the House of Commons on Tuesday night, arising out of Mr. Hume's motion for a vote of thanks to Lord Ashburton, in connexion with the treaty of Washington.

The motion brought up the ablest men on both sides of the House; but the subject has been worn thread-bare by previous discussions, and its novelty has passed away. There were some able speeches and clever party skirmishing. Sir Robert Peel was more than usually brief and quiescent. He was, perhaps, purposely so, from a wish not to repeat himself, after his slashing reply on a former occasion, to Lord Palmerston, and had this been the feeling of others, the debate would have been less protracted. But, though brief, he was effective, and his allusion to the speedy settlement of the Oregon question was favorably received by the House as it will be by the country.

Lords Palmerston and Russell on the opposition, and Lord Stanley on the Ministerial side, were the leading orators.
The speech of the first named nobleman, which terminated the discussion, was bitter and sarcastic mixed, as it was towards the close, with domestic politics, that added to his pungency.

SPAIN

No progress appears to be made in the formation of a new Cabinet, and so far as we can judge from appearances, the popularity of Espartero is decidedly on the wane.

The lease of the Almaden quicksilver mines so as to throw them in fact into the hands of the Rothschilds, seems to excite a good deal of jealousy among the anti-French portion of the people.

Numerous robberies continue to be perpetrated in the province of Catalonia, and the people are still evidently in a state of feverish excitement.

M. Weismüller, the agent at Manford of the Rothschild firm, was robbed recently near Burgos, but the robbers, after relieving him of his money, quietly suffered him to proceed on his journey.

GREECE

We see it stated in a letter from Athens that King Otto threatens to abdicate his throne, unless the most potent sovereigns of Europe, who placed him where he is, shall lend him more money. He thinks it outrageous that they should expect him to govern such a people with an empty treasury, and with no means of replenishing it without oppressing the people.

CIRCASSIA

The rumor, heretofore given, that Russia was preparing a great expedition against Circassia, is confirmed by further accounts. The Emperor, it is said, is determined not to protect this useless war much longer; and if the powerful expedition now on foot does not prove successful, he will acknowledge the right of the hardy mountaineers to govern themselves. A strict blockade is to be enforced along the Black sea, and the whole Russian army along the frontiers of Poland, and a large portion of the garrisons, are to be drawn into the expedition. There is hardly a hope that the Circassians will be able to withstand this powerful force—but then he luck has hitherto been all on their side, and may sustain them still.

PERSIA

At the last accounts from Bagdad, serious apprehensions were entertained of another collision between the Persian and Turkish troops. The latter were concentrated at Bagdad thirty thousand strong, and there was about an equal force at Erzurum. The pasha of Bagdad has received orders to occupy, at all hazards, his former positions, which the frontiers of Persia—a movement which the Persians will not submit to without fighting.

IRELAND

The affairs of Ireland are assuming a highly interesting and important character. The excitement on the subject of Repeal rises exceedingly high, and, added to the disaffection of the tenantry in other respects, bids fair to blow up the flame of revolution in good earnest. The late Repeal riots at Clonane, in the county of Monaghan, which were suppressed only by the interference of the military have been followed by demonstrations in other places which look like anything but peace and quietness. The doctrine of Repeal is now openly denounced as Treason by a portion of the conservative press, and the strong action of the government is invoked for its suppression. Where these things will end, God only knows.

The tenantry of Mr. Shirley, at Carrickmacross, near Drogheda, had turned out, and had paraded through a part of the barony of Farney, committing various outrages.—The fields and hills were filled with crowds of people, shouting and shouting, and declaring they would pay no more rent. The military and constabulary forces were out, and the greatest excitement prevailed.

Wheat Crop in England.—All accounts concur in representing the growing wheat in England as very promising. The Montreal Herald, which appears to have investigated the subject with care, says "a greater quantity of land than usual is under wheat crop, and with but an ordinary yield, the required imports will not be so great as in former years."

On Continent the prospect is also very flattering. At Stettin the finest Uckermark wheat weighing from 61 to 63 lbs. is selling at 31s to 31s 6d a quarter on board. This is only 85 cents a bushel. At these prices we see nothing to raise the price of wheat in the interior of Illinois and other western States, beyond what it now is—25 cents a bushel. To prosper, the people of those inland sections must turn more attention to making pork and lard, growing hump and wool, to the manufacture of every article to which their circumstances are adapted. The dairy business is too much neglected at the west, and if well understood, and judiciously prosecuted, it would be far more profitable than growing corn at ten cents a bushel or wheat at 80 cents.

TURKEY AND RUSSIA.

The telegraph correspondence between the Emperor Nicholas and the Sultan, on the affairs of Servia, which has just come to hand, is made up of two interesting State Papers.—That correspondence exhibits the designs of Russia on Turkey, in a more undisguised point of view, and in a more unequivocal and audacious language, than any previous manifestation. The letter of the Czar would almost seem to have been composed for the express purpose of arousing the other allies of the Sultan to a sense of danger impending over the Ottoman Empire; in it alternately sparkle rage and cunning—a desire to precipitate and force the Porte into a rupture with Russia.

PORTUGAL

Lisbon papers, to the 24th of April, give an account of a destructive fire which broke out on the 22nd, in a large public building called the Collegio dos Nobres, formerly the Jesuits' College, and latterly the Polytechnic School. It appears the fire was caused by an explosion, which took place while some chemical experiments were being made. The King and his Aide-de-camp were speedily on the spot, and rendered every assistance. The greater part of the building was destroyed; one of the French sailors lost his life on the occasion.

MASSACRE OF THE GOVERNOR OF THE MARQUESAS ISLANDS AND SUITE.—We regret to state, that very melancholy intelligence has just been brought to this country from the new French settlement in the Pacific by a merchant vessel, the Sarah Ann Schopper, which left Otaheite on the 23d of October.

It appears that the French Governor of the Marquesas, with fourteen attendants, had been on a visit to the native King, Nicahevar where they had been hospitably entertained, and suspecting no danger, they left his residence to return to the French station without probably, taking proper precaution against the treachery of the natives.

They were attacked on the way, and the Governor and fourteen persons were killed. This unfortunate event proves the unfriendly disposition of the natives; but what will it avail them! The French Government will instantly send out a sufficient force to crush all opposition.

LIVERPOOL COTTON MARKET.

The trade here continued to purchase a fair quantity of Cotton daily, since the departure of the Great Western; the accumulating stocks, however, have had the effect of imparting a dull tone to the market, and the demand has been very freely met, more especially as regarded the common qualities of American.—All descriptions above fair are scarce and very firm in value, and in prices altogether we have no change to report. The state of the manufacturing districts is encouraging; many circumstances induce an expectation of a continued improvement in the trade generally, and the consumption of Cotton continues greatly on the increase. The sales, imports, &c. will not be made up by the brokers until the close of the week, but the quantity sold during the four last days, will not fall short of 2,200 bales.—7,000 bales have met with buyers to day, including 2,500 on speculation, and 500 for export.

LIVERPOOL CORN MARKET.

Since our last report, trade has remained in a very inactive state. The market this morning was attended only by a small number of local millers and dealers, and very few buyers from the country.

There has been a good supply constantly and from Ireland during the past week, but there have been no large imports from abroad.

A few parcels of Wheat for consumption were taken at a decline of 1d. on Foreign, but there was no general disposition to accept lower prices. Flour met a moderate sale at the previous rates.

Barley, Malt, Beans and Peas, exceedingly dull, and prices nominal.

For Oats, there have been few inquiries to-day, and we continue our former quotations.

LONDON TRADE REPORT.—May 2.

Sugar.—The sales in the raw market to-day, amount to 670 hhds at prices generally a shade higher than last Friday. No public sales of East India took place to-day. Privately some parcels of Mauritius have changed hands, at full prices, the accounts received from that island being confirmatory of a very short coming crop.

Coffee.—For 100 casks B. P. very little competition appeared; Jamaica sold rather easier for the low and middling qualities; 140 bags of Ceylon brought 54s for colour, but the ordinary was taken in at 50s; privately some parcels are offering at 50s; 730 bags East India brought 24s to 27s 6d., for various kinds of low bazaar.

Tea.—The sales have gone off rather heavily, which is to be attributed to the large quantity brought forward, occasioning the buyers to refrain from purchasing until the sales had so far proceeded as to enable them to ascertain the lowest prices likely to be submitted to.—8400 packages passed sale, of which only about one half were sold. The prices of the common low may be quoted at 1-2 to 1d. per lb lower than at some late sales; other qualities have little variation in price.

On Continent the prospect is also very flattering. At Stettin the finest Uckermark wheat weighing from 61 to 63 lbs. is selling at 31s to 31s 6d a quarter on board. This is only 85 cents a bushel. At these prices we see nothing to raise the price of wheat in the interior of Illinois and other western States, beyond what it now is—25 cents a bushel. To prosper, the people of those inland sections must turn more attention to making pork and lard, growing hump and wool, to the manufacture of every article to which their circumstances are adapted. The dairy business is too much neglected at the west, and if well understood, and judiciously prosecuted, it would be far more profitable than growing corn at ten cents a bushel or wheat at 80 cents.

THE NEIGHBOR.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 21, 1843.

Early Vegetables.—We have had green peas in Naavoo the last fortnight, and this week we had the pleasure of supping on young potatoes, and from all appearances are likely to have an average crop of the latter.

Why are those who believe in false prophecies like a kind of gingham? Because they are seer suckers.—Bos. Post. Quite a conundrum, but Mr. Post, why are those people who do not believe in any prophecies now-a-days like wood set up in a coal pit? Because they are fixed for burning.

The fraternity of Free and Accepted Masons, intend celebrating the anniversary of Saints John on Saturday next, by laying the corner stone of the Masonic Temple, in Naavoo, where an oration will be delivered on the occasion. After the ceremony of laying the stone has been a tended to, they will adjourn to the Washington Hotel where a dinner will be provided by Mr. Warner.

ANTHEMS.
To be sung on the occasion of laying the Corner Stone of the Masonic Hall, in the City of Naavoo, June 24, 1843.

[Tune—Arlington.]
To heaven's high Architect all praise,
All gratitude be given,
Who design'd the human soul to raise
By secrets sprung from heaven.

Now swells the choir in solemn tone,
And hovering Angels join;
Religion looks delighted down,
When voices praise the shrine.

Blest be the place! thither repair
The true and pious train;
Devotion wake her anthems there,
And I'llaven accept the strain.

[Tune—Sabbary.]
Genius! of Masonry, descend,
And with thee bring thy spotless train:
Constant our sacred rites attend,
While we adore thy peaceful reign;
Bring with thee Virtue, brightest maid,
Bring love, bring truth, bring friendship here;

While social mirth shall lend her aid,
To smooth the wrinkled brow of care.
Come, O charity, with goodness crown'd,
Enrich led in thy heavenly robe,
Diffuse thy blessings all around,
To every corner of the globe.

See where she comes, with power to bless,
With open hand and tender heart,
Which wounded feels at man's distress,
And bleeds at every human smart;
Envy may every ill devise,
And falsehood be thy deadliest foe.

Thou friendship, still shalt towering rise,
And sink thine adversaries low;
Thy well built pile shall long endure,
Thro' rolling years preserve its prime,
Upon a rock it stands secure,
And braves the rude assaults of time.

Ye happy few who here extend
In per petuities, from east to west,
With fervent zeal the lodge defend,
And lock its secrets in each breast:
Since ye are met upon the square,
Bid love and friendship jointly reign.

Be peace and harmony your care,
Nor break the adamant chain;
Behold the planets, how they move,
Yet keep due order as they run;
Then imitate the stars above,
And shine resplendent as the sun.

Wheat.—The prospect of an abundant wheat crop in the Territory was never as flattering as at the present time. It is believed that unless some unforeseen injury should destroy the prospective crop now on the ground, the quantity harvested the present year in Wisconsin will be double that of any preceding year. The only apprehension which we have learned is, that some of the farmers in Walworth county are fearful that the wheat now on the ground will be so rank as to cause it to lodge, and thus blight the yield. The chilly weather the present spring, which has been unfavorable to corn and most kinds of vegetation, has been favorable to the growth of wheat.

Truth in a Nut Shell.—The Lowell (Mass.) Vox Populi says that all men are endowed with certain unalienable rights—except poor men. All men who do not pay their honest debts are great scamps—except those who cheat on a large scale. All men are born free and equal—except negroes. All men are great sinners—except those who belong to the church. All men are allowed to think and act freely—except those who work for a living. All well dressed and accomplished women are ladies—except factory girls.

Gone over the Falls.—We learn that on Friday last a man went over the cataraict on the Canadian side of the Niagara. He was driving a pair of horses and had backed into the river to get a load of sand, somewhere nearly opposite Navy Island, when the current bore off the wagon and horses beyond the control of the driver towards the rapids. A person who witnessed the perilous situation, made off in a canoe to intercept them, but getting alarmed for his own safety, had to change his course and return again. One of the horses extricated himself from the wagon, and swam in safety to the shore, while his mate and the driver were seen to pitch from one shoot to the other, until they plunged into the abyss below.—Commercial.

The whole town of Tallahassee, Florida, was destroyed by fire on the 25th ult. Nothing but a few houses in the suburbs now remains—258 houses, including the principal public buildings, printing offices, stores, ware-houses, merchandises, &c. &c. Texas Gold.—The following article, relative to the mineral wealth of the country, we clip from a late number of the Red Lander:

"A party were recently conducted to the silver mines situated between the streams of Llano and San Saba, on the Llano. One of the party, Mr. Holden, discovered and brought away specimens of one of gold, found in small particles through a guage of white quartz. They were lead to the place by an old Indian, who states that he was with the party who massacered the Spaniards who formerly worked these silver mines; as evidence of the latter they were shown three old furnaces.

"Mr. Holden has visited the gold region of Georgia, and expresses a belief that the country from which he had lately returned was far more prolific than any portion of that state. The old man says, there are two large veins of pure silver in the bed of a small stream above Llano, and has offered to guide a party thither; and it appears they are about to set out on the trip. The silver, it is said, is here seen projecting above the rocks, and so soft as to yield to a knife like wood.

Miraculous Escape.—During a severe hail storm, on the 7th inst., a house occupied by French people, situated in the west part of Pittsburgh, N. Y. was struck by lightning. Fifteen persons were in the house at the time, and four of them were knocked down and several stunned. The fluid struck one of the females on the foot, separating the sole of her shoe from the upper leather, from heel to toe. The house was considerably shattered, and the escape of so many individuals from instant death, is almost miraculous!

Great Freshet.—On last Sabbath night, our immediate neighborhood, and a few miles north, was visited by a most destructive storm of rain. The streams were more swollen than they have been within the recollection of the "oldest inhabitant," or at least for about 50 years. All of the dams on Whitewater and its tributaries, within four or five miles of this place, have been more or less injured, many of them swept entirely away. The loss to our mill owners is not easily estimated; but it cannot be less than $20,000.

A Dream Interpreted.—A German prince in a dream seeing three rats, one fat, the other lean, and the third blind, sent for a celebrated Bohemian gipsy, and demanded an explanation. The fat rat, said the sorceress, is your prime minister, the lean rat, your people, and the blind rat, yourself.

Illinois Ahead.—The Pekin Palladium states that near Le Roy, McLean county, a woman had SIX fine children at a birth, weighing 26 lbs. 3 oz. The fact is obtained from the most respectable authority. We defy even Delaware to beat this. In fact we believe that Illinois can scarcely do it again.—[Buff. Econ.

Right of Visitation.—Whatever some of the London Editors may think or say, we gather enough from private advices, to be fully satisfied that the British Government will not attempt to remove the question of visit and search from the ground on which it is placed by Mr. Webster's despatch to Mr. Everett. That Government apparently prefers to leave the usage on its present footing, without contending for the admission by this Government of a corresponding right, which this Government has declared its determination not to recognize.

The idea advanced by Mr. Wood in the British House of Commons, adopted by Sir Robert Peel, of a known distinction between Visit and Search, although plausible—and in our opinion (heretofore expressed) both rational and practical—has, we have reason to suppose, been found to be unsatisfactory, or at least incompatible with principles heretofore maintained by the British Government itself. It will probably not be again advanced.

Contrary, we confess to our expectations, but very much to our satisfaction, appearances indicate that the despatch of the Secretary of State to Mr. Everett, referred to above, will be regarded, even in England, as maintaining doctrines which that Government is not disposed to dispute.

Under the present good understanding between the two governments, therefore, should vessels of the United States on the one hand, or those of Great Britain on the other, happen as they may, to be visited under circumstances warranting strong suspicion that they are Portuguese or Spanish, sailing under the flag of the Union or of Britain, detention occasioned by such visits will be treated as detentions by mistake, and not as acts done by virtue of any pre-existing known right of visit. In short, they will be regarded as wrongs, but unintentional wrongs committed only on the strength of weighty presumptive evidence, and from a sincere desire to abolish a traffic denominated as piracy, by both Governments.—Nat. Int.

Two Steamboats Sunk!—It is our painful duty to record one of the most melancholy accidents that has occurred on the waters of the St. Lawrence for many years. About four o'clock yesterday morning, the steamers Lord Sydenham and The Queen came into collision in Lake St. Peter, and with so much force that, we regret to say, they both sank—the latter in such a depth of water as to cause the loss of several lives.—The weather was so extremely foggy, that, as we can learn, no blame can be attached to either party.—Montreal Times.

The Caledonia brought a million and a half of dollars over to this country.

To remove warps from a cow's udder, wash the part two or three times a day with a strong decoction of alum and water. It is an excellent and simple remedy.

Specie.—The New York banks have now about $12,000,000 of specie in their vaults. The Locos, we presume, will admit that they, at least, are in a healthy condition.

Five hundred ladies of Mobile have positioned the authorities of that city to levy a separate and fixed tax upon all unmarried men there. There seems to be a fixed determination on their part to drive the bachelors there to commit either matrimony or suicide.

A City without Banks.—All the banks in Buffalo, having failed and forfeited their charters, the people of that great commercial emporium of Western New York are now without any rag-money shavingmill whatever.

Read and Understand.—Many people think that to advertise in a public paper is giving that amount of money to the printer. This is a most egregious error. The advertiser receives the greatest benefit—the city or town the next greatest, and the printer the least of all. Upon picking up a newspaper, the first thing the business man refers to, is the advertising page. If he finds a goodly number of new advertisements—if he sees that the merchants, the mechanics, and the professional men generally and liberally advertise—in short, if he sees a sheet well filled with advertisements he immediately sets down that city or town in his own mind, as a thriving and business place. On the contrary—if the advertisements are few, and the paper presents a sickly, unhealthy appearance (for advertisements give life and health to a newspaper, in as great a degree as pure air and wholesome food gives life and health to the body) he at once concludes, that there is no business doing in the place where it is printed.

There is no man we care not what his business may be, can do as well without advertising as with. He becomes known, by it—his business becomes known, and men are ten times more apt to deal with those who advertise liberally, than with those who do not advertise at all. Look around our busy town. Where do we see the most bustle and the most business? In those stores where the merchant advertises most liberally, of course. In short, liberal public, advertise, if you want business. Those who advertise most, prosper most. This is an advertising age, and an advertising community! Recollect it.

Cholic in Horses.—A tea-cup full of spirits of turpentine will give instant relief to horses laboring under this disorder. The relief is said to be instantaneous. The same remedy for cattle sick from eating green food, is recommended.

Miller's Prophecy Confirmed.—Some mathematical chap who has been looking into Miller's system, confirms it in the following manner: He has discovered that if you multiply the number of years that Pius was Pope, (which Pius is not recollected, as there were seven of that title) by the number of pegs in Luther's boots, and that sum by the nails in the heels, and then add a boot belonging to Mr. Himes, the total will be 1843. Of course this calculation settles the question.

A Bit of Romance.—A man has just returned to Louisville after an absence of twenty years from his family. His wife, in his absence, supposing him dead, married a second and third time, and became a widow. The long-lost husband has wooed her again, and they are to be married once more. In his absence he was captured off Cuba, and for many years was a prisoner in Spain. He escaped and joined the army of Bolivar in South America, and fought in many battles. He found his old wife somewhat changed in every thing except her heart. This is a Rip Van Winkle story, yet the Dime vouches for its truth.

The Press in Sweden.—It is said that Sweden, with a population of hardly 2,000,000, supports no less than 70 political journals, besides those strictly religious or scientific.

United States Court.—Defect in the Law.—A curious instance of oversight or omission in law makers, has been discovered in this city, within the few last days. A colored man named John Christian, who had been steward on board the Beaulieu, was sent home a prisoner by the American Consul at Bahia, for attempting to poison the master of that vessel, Capt. Stanhope, while she was lying at Bahia. Along with the prisoner, were also sent home two others of the crew as witnesses to the alleged crime. On arriving here, the prisoner, was examined on the charge, before the United States Commissioner Rapalyie, and the prisoner's counsel contended that the law, although it had awarded the same punishment for murder committed by poison, as for murder committed by any other means, yet contains no provision whatever making the attempt to poison an offence or ordering any punishment for it. On a thorough examination of the law by eminent counsel, it turned out that such was the case, and the prisoner was discharged yesterday.—Jour. of Com.

The Beggars Boarding House.—A Death Scene.—We recently gave a sketch of the Five Points from the pen of N. P. Willis. It described a frightful condition of affairs. But Philadelphia is, we are informed, not wholly exempt from scenes analogous to those described in that outline. We are assured that there now exists in a northern suburb of the city, and near the Delaware, an establishment of the most remarkable kind. The house consists of six rooms, the lower of which is occupied by a female as a grog shop. Each of the others is occupied by boarders, and sometimes as many as six or eight persons may be found sleeping in one room. These pay their board in cold victuals, and for the most part the occupants consist of the very refuse of our population. Our informant a clergyman, was drawn thither some weeks since, by information that an old woman to whom he had been in the habit of rendering assistance during the cold weather, was dying. He visited the scene, and found that the intelligence was correct. The old beggar was at death's door, but horrible to relate, she was insensible from intoxication! The next day, a lady connected with one of our benevolent societies called. The scene was, if possible, still more appalling than on the preceding day. The mother was dead, and not far from her corpse lay a grown up daughter, utterly unconscious from drink! But still worse, several children had partaken of the poisonous beverage, and were also laboring under its dreadful effects. Old age, and death, and middle life, and childhood, want, misery and intoxication were all promiscuously blended together. "I felt the blood curdle in my veins" said our informant, "as I contemplated the picture of wretchedness, vice and indolence. And yet," he added, "like scenes are by no means rare." Even the kind hearted sometimes shun them, in very nausea, apprehension and horror.—[Phil. Inq.]

Honesty.—The people of Vermont are celebrated the world over for morality and uprightness—but we were not aware till lately that even their convicted scoundrels were among the most trustworthy men in the community. The Mercury says that a young man recently arrived at Windsor in the stage, and applied for admission in the State Prison—showing the papers which entitled him to a residence there. It seems he had been convicted at Montpelier of some offence, sentenced to the State Prison for six months, and in order to save expense was fitted out with his papers and sent to Windsor by stage, without Sheriff or other attendant! On reaching Woodstock the stage by accident left him; but he coolly waited a day and took the next stage.

The Hypochondriac Prince.—Many distinguished persons from a disease in the imagination, have fallen into strange notions regarding their personal identity and character. In the Memoirs of Count de Maurepas, there is an account given of a most singular hypochondriac in the person of the Prince of Bourbon. He once imagined himself to be a hare, and would suffer no bell to be rung in the palace, lest the noise should scare him into the woods. At another time, he fancied himself to be a plant, and, as he stood in the garden, insisted on being watered. He some time afterwards imagined he was dead, and refused all nourishment, for which he said, he had no further occasion. This last whim would have proved fatal, if his friends had not contrived to disguise two persons, who were introduced to him as his grandfather and Marshal Luxembourg, and who after some conversation concerning the shades, invited him to dine with Marshal Turenne. Our hypochondriac followed them into a cellar prepared for the purpose, where he made a hearty meal.—While this turn of disorder prevailed, he always dined in the cellar with some noble ghost. It is somewhat remarkable that this strange fantasy did not incapacitate him for business, especially where his immediate interests were concerned. Hypochondriacism is doubtless produced in a great measure, from deep study, or from an artificial mode of living, and a want of proper air and exercise. We seldom hear of a ploughman or an artisan falling into that diseased state of the imagination, and considering themselves hares, vegetables, plants, or disembodied spirits.

Look out for it!—Ebenezer has had a new poetical machine made to order, and sundry effusions may be expected as soon as the wheels get a little smooth. As soon as he got it yesterday he set a small negro boy to turning the crank, and slipping in a piece of paper between the rollers it produced the following:

The clouds dispersed, the moon it shines,
Our old dog gnawed a marrow bone—
I wanted to see an old rat wink,
When Nabby's cat fell in the drink.
I saw a possum on the road,
A play in Euclid with a toad,
And then I saw a monstrous flea
A crawling up on saint Jeremiah's nose
When she had drunk tea.

There boy I knew it would go wrong.
The regulation revolver has too great a centropetal force to correspond with the horizontal metre plate, upon which the cylindrical pressure is at present not only too severe, but entirely unmeasured in its revolutions—sham! We must see to having it put in immediate order! Boy give us a glass of cool water!

Lieut. Gen. of the Nauvoo Legion.

Nauvoo, June 20, 1843.

To THE EDITOR OF THE NEIGHBOR.

Sir, In obedience to the call made in your paper, for information in relation to the affairs of the Agricultural and Manufacturing Association of this city, I give you such facts as I think will be satisfactory. The first great object of the company was to establish a Pottery, for the manufacturing of the various kinds of crockery in common use in the country. Persons were deputed to make the necessary search, whether suitable materials could be obtained. The persons who were employed, in this service were such as had been employed all their lives in the business; their report was favorable, having found all the materials, of as good a quality as those used in the old world for that purpose, in our immediate vicinity. Efforts were accordingly made to commence the business with as little delay as possible; an eligible situation was obtained, and the work of building commenced. A stone building of sufficient size was put under construction, and progressed with much rapidity. Persons possessing means, felt desirous of investing a part of them at least, in the business. All was prosperous, and all flattering; a considerable amount of land was obtained for agricultural purposes; it being the wish of the managers, to supply all their workmen with all their necessities, as far as could be. Arrangements were making to get stock of the various kinds, for this purpose. The building had progressed nearly to the height of one story, when the electioneering campaign commenced, and it was roundly asserted that if certain persons were elected, all the charters, granted by a previous legislature to the citizens of Nauvoo, would be repealed. At first the Association supposed that this was merely an electioneering intrigue; but it assumed a formidable appearance, and began to assume the character of a fixed determination to carry the design into execution. The subsequent acts of the Legislature, have given but too much evidence, that such was the real intention of a very considerable portion of the members of the last Legislature, if not a majority of them. This in a clique paralyzed the exertions of the company; many who were about to contribute to the funds of the society paused, not knowing what was best; and, in consequence, the work stopped. Not that the company supposed, that there was any such power vested in the Legislature, either in the Constitution or common sense; but they did not know how far a reckless spirit might lead men in the violation of both. As the matter now stands, those having capital at a loss whether to invest it in that way or not, lest the same reckless spirit may, inevitably, carry the proposed design into effect.

The work has not stopped for want of means, nor materials to carry on the business as means, materials and workmen of the first order, are all at hand, but where is the safety? While such doctrines are boldly maintained by our Legislature. All the prospects of the company may be blasted at any stage of their business, by one single act of men who seem to have no interest in the prosperity of the State, nor the citizens thereof, apart from their own political preference. Pledges can be made, for the sake of preferment, to an ignorant constituency, to commit the most flagrant abuses, upon the rights of private companies, or even individuals, and attempts made with zeal and determination to carry them out to the extent.

Can public confidence be restored, the work can go on more vigorous than ever. Respectfully,
SIDNEY RIDGON,
Pres't. of the company.

OUR PLEASURE EXCURSION.

Mr. Editor:—
On Saturday morning, the 17th inst., a large and respectable company of ladies and gentlemen took passage on board the Steam Boat "Maid of Iowa," for the purpose of passing the day in a pleasure excursion to Shokkoquon, a little town situated some thirty miles up the river. The day was delightful and every thing seemed to promise an agreeable trip. The company set out with light and joyful hearts, and the Nauvoo Band played a pleasant air as the steamer pushed her way up the broad current of the Mississippi.

At 11 o'clock we landed at Fort Madison where we were kindly received by the inhabitants. Captain Jones informed us that he would remain there one hour, which gave us a fine opportunity to view the town. It is quite pleasantly situated upon the Iowa side, and its location we considered a healthy one. It contained several good buildings; but we do not recollect that we saw any new ones erecting, with the exception of the Iowa Penitentiary. A number of us visited this work and found it progressing, though not as rapidly as we had anticipated. It promises to be a substantial prison, and, when completed as is anticipated it will by no means be an inferior one. It has now attained the height of one story little more than half the way round, and is covered with a temporary roof which furnishes shelter to the convicts and the kind family of the Warden.

While examining this work Mrs. G— arrived, with her attendant friends, and asked the privilege of seeing her husband which the Warden politely granted. We were all now seated in the entrance hall and the sound of clanking chains issued from the cell and fell harshly upon our ears. The convict entered the room where we were seated; and, O, horror! what a spectacle was presented to the contemplative and feeling mind! There stood the timid wife—there the athletic convict! He lifted his chain and ball from off his shoulder, which fell upon the floor with a heavy, hollow sound, as if to warn the by-standers, with an awful voice, never to step aside from the path of honesty and uprightness. O, who can imagine the pungent emotions of a wife, under circumstances like these, as her eyes fell upon the chains of the guilty husband, and she reluctantly reaches forth to grasp the hand to which she once fondly clung at the hymeneal altar! That form stood before her, stout and healthy; but, alas! that wife was deprived of his fostering care! Crime had marked his footsteps; and justice—stern and unbending—ever prompt, sooner or later, to overtake the guilty and shield the innocent—had fixed upon him the just recompense of his works. O, reader! learn a lesson of honesty from this incident, and never bring shame, dishonor, sorrow and grief to the wife of your bosom, by ever causing her to behold you under circumstances so humiliating and humbled as these!

We resumed our journey towards our place of destination. As we passed up the river, we were delighted at the bold, prominent scenery which the country, on either side, presented. Here and there we hurried past fairy isles, covered with the foliage of summer, wooing the weary traveller to their bosoms by the redundancy of their cooling shade—now we passed under the shadow of some mighty bluff, that rose in haughty grandeur above us—and now farther up, our eyes stretched far away over a country presenting a more even and gradual aspect. We landed at length at Shokkoquon, where we remained one hour. While there we were favored with a very able discourse from Elder George A. Smith, who is a member of the quorum of the Twelve. "But the liberal devilish liberal things; and by liberal things shall he stand," was his text, his remarks were elegantly adapted to the occasion and a beautiful illustration of the doctrines of the church to which he is attached. When service was over, the steamer moved from shore, and when coming night had veiled the face of nature with a gray twilight, we arrived at our beautiful home of Nauvoo; all greatly elated at the pleasantness of the day's trip.

ONE OF THE PASSENGERS.

Titles are but nicknames, and every nickname is a title. The thing is perfectly harmless in itself, but it marks a sort of foppishness in the human character which degrades it. It renders man diminutive in things which are great, and the counterfeit of woman in things which are little. It talks about its fine riband like a girl, and shows its garter like a child. A certain writer, of some antiquity, says, "When I was a child, I thought as a child; but when I became a man, I put away childish things."

It is, properly, from the elevated mind of France, that the folly has been abolished. It has outgrown the baby-clothes of count and duke, and breeched itself in manhood. France has not levelled, it has exalted. It has put down the dwarf to set up the man. The insignificance of a senseless word like duke, count or earl, has ceased to please. Even those who possessed them have disowned the gibberish, and, as they outgrew the rickets, have despised the rattle. The genuine mind of man, thirsting for its native home, society contemns the gewgaws that separate him from it. Titles are like circles drawn by the magician's wand, to contract the sphere of man's felicity. He lives immured within the bastille of a word, and surveys at a distance the envied life of man.

Is it then any wonder that titles should fall in France? Is it not a greater wonder they should be kept up any where? What are they? What is their worth—nay, "what is their amount?" When we think or speak of a judge or a general, we associate with it the ideas of office and character; we think of gravity in the one, and bravery in the other; but when we use a word merely as a title, no ideas associate with it. Through all the vocabulary of Adam, there is not such an animal as a duke or a count; neither can we connect any certain idea to the words. Whether they mean strength or weakness, wisdom or folly, a child or a man, a rider or a horse, is all equivocal. What respect then can be paid to that which describes nothing, and which means nothing?—Imagination has given figure and character to centaurs, satyrs, and down to all the fairy tribe; but titles baffle even the powers of fancy, and are a chimerical nondescript.

But this is not all. If a whole country is disposed to hold them in contempt, all their value is gone, and none will own them. It is common opinion only that makes them any thing or nothing, or worse than nothing. There is no occasion to take titles away, for they take themselves away when society concurs to ridicule them. This species of imaginary consequence has visibly declined in every part of Europe, and it hastens to its exit as the world of reason continues to rise. There was a time when the lowest class of what are called nobility, was more thought of than the highest is now, and when a man in armor riding through Christendom in search of adventures was more stared at than a modern duke. The world has seen this folly fall, and it has fallen by being laughed at, and the farce of titles will follow its fate. The patriots of France have discovered in good time, that rank and dignity in society must take a new ground. The old one has fallen through. It must now take the substantial ground of character, instead of the chimerical ground of titles; and they have brought their titles to the altar, and made of them burnt-offerings to reason. [Extract from Thomas Paine's Answer to Mr. Burke's Attack on the French Revolution.]

LINES WRITTEN ON THE FATE OF POLAND.

(BY WILLIAM RODGERS DECD.)

Hail! land of the noble, the fearless and brave,
Where the banners of freedom, in triumph did wave,
When hurrying thy vengeance upon thy proud foes,
When thou to the battle all wrathful arose.
Disdaining the name of a prince or a throne,
A tyrant thou spurn'd, nor a king wouldst thou own.
What conquests, what battles, what names so divine,
When thou in thy splendor and glory didst shine.
When thy day star of freedom shone from on high,
And thy sons thus went forth to conquer or die;
Sobiesky was thine—who so fearlessly did;
The strength of the Ottomans' power and pride;
Yet Poland a brighter than his canst thou claim,
Kosciusko's splendid and fearless name;
He fought for his country—he fought for his home,
And woe to the tyrant, that caused him to roam.
Yet thy sons would not bear the oppressors' vile yoke.
Nor bow at pleasure who held them in chains,
Without a fierce struggle their freedom to gain.
They swore both great Poland and God to maintain.

The rights of their country, her freedom and fame,
As spotless and pure as their forefathers' name;
And trusting to God—and the awards that they wield,
They vow like their fathers—to die on the field.
Or triumph in glory—or Poland's proud foes,
Redressing their wrongs and avenging her woes,
With swords brightly gleaming that thirst for a life,
Oh! see them rush gallantly on to the strife.
While shouts from the living and groans from the dying,
Are mournfully mingled with foemen defying;
While cannon are roaring—loud, deeply and long,
Forth belching death onward—dark, dreadful and strong.
The horsemen are mounted—now see how they ride,
How swiftly they charge and how swiftly they glide;
And prancing and snorting they drive on the foe,
While life streams are flowing with every fierce blow.

And freemen are crush'd and their bosoms are trod,
By the merciless horse like the shop beaten rod,
But Poland—the war clouds rise darkly and deep,
The thy flame be afloat, thy death knell is near.
Lo! see how thy children are strid on the plain,
All mingled, insulted and trampled, and slain;
Woe! woe! to the monarch that weareth the crown,
Whose slaves are now crushing and bearing them down—
May wrath from on high and the darkness of death, Crush them like a blighting and poisonous breath.

MR. J. B. NEWHALL'S LECTURE.

The lecture given by Mr. Newhall at the Lyceum Hall, on Monday evening week, was one of more than ordinary interest. He entered after he had commenced. He was then describing the general features of the country called the "West." He spoke of the little band of adventurers who emigrated from the New England States to Ohio. This band or company, consisted of revolutionary officers and soldiers, called the Ohio Company, to whom the Continental Congress made a grant of a million and a half acres of land to the North West of the Ohio. It was organized at Boston in March, 1786. The first permanent settlement was made by a band of 47 emigrants from the counties of Essex and Middlesex (Mass.), and the States of Rhode Island and Connecticut. They founded Marietta on the 7th of April, 1789. Seven years afterwards, Gen. Wayne effectually subdued the savages. From this period may be dated that unexampled prosperity which has so signally distinguished Ohio from all the Western States. The fame of this region for richness of soil, and amenity of climate, drew multitudes of emigrants from the Atlantic country; and in 1810, it contained 45,365 inhabitants. It was admitted into the Union in 1802. It has continued progressively to advance in population, wealth and industry, and exhibits the most striking instance of the rapid progress of social improvement, which any age or country can boast, unless we except Iowa. After giving a very interesting description of Ohio as it now is; its immense resources, (and had we time and room for insertion, it might be interesting to specify them,) he went on to describe the States of Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, Missouri, and lastly Iowa. He said that—taken as a whole, in every point of view, afforded more advantages, and therefore stronger inducements to emigrate, than any other State in the Union. This we think, he made evident to every one present. He gave a detailed and exceedingly interesting account of the unlimited resources of this State. This is the country for the good things of the earth. All the fruits, grains and roots of the temperate regions of the globe grow most luxuriantly. The wheat is of the finest quality; and there are very few parts of the West, if any, where corn and potatoes are raised with greater ease and abundance, and of better quality. Wild fruits and about every kind of berries, excepting huckle, alias whortleberry, are very abundant in many places. He spoke of the wild grape as growing very luxuriantly and in great abundance. That foreign vines might be grafted if desirable, by the choicest grafts from foreign ones. Garden vegetables of every kind succeed remarkably well. We might here give a minute description of every vegetable, fruit, and the different kinds of grain raised in Iowa and Wisconsin, but the limits forbid. Many of an emigrating spirit who have been inclined to go to the West, have hesitated on account of the ferocious wild beasts that inhabit that country—such as bears, wolves, &c. But they, as well as the buffalo are now seldom or never seen. Their doom is sealed. They, like the poor Indian, have been driven before the strong current of emigration and the sound of the axe. Deer, elk, foxes, rabbits, raccoons, squirrels, opossums, otters, beavers and muskrats are very numerous. Wild horses are also caught and sold from 20 to 30 dollars. Thousands of hogs are raised annually with but little attention or expense. The beef raised in Iowa is the best in the world, being very tender and delicious. Poultry is also raised in great profusion. Some farmers raise from three to four hundred fowls in a season, besides turkeys, geese, ducks, &c.

The rivers and lakes are filled with fish of the most delicious kind. The bass, trout, catfish, perch, eel, pike, pickerel, mullet, sturgeon, and various other kinds are caught in great abundance and sent to market in great wagon loads. He spoke of the white fish in particular, as one of the finest fish in America, and millions of them are caught and packed up every year and sent to the eastern market. We recollect that in 1837 the American Fur Company packed over 3,500 barrels.

As to birds, the rivers and lakes are almost literally covered—especially in Autumn and Spring. The most common are swans, pelicans, geese, ducks, cranes water turkeys. And on the Prairies, wild turkeys, prairie fowls, plovers, partridges, woodcocks, snipes, pheasants, herons and wild pigeons; the latter as we are informed, being shot by the barrel. We think there must be some real pleasure in "going-a-gunning" in such a country as that.

Mr. Newhall spoke of the vast resources of wealth from the mineral kingdom. Here a rich field opens, especially to the capitalist. The minerals are lead, copper, iron, zinc, limestone, sand and free-stone, bituminous coal, alabaster, saltpetre, cornelian stone, epsom salts, agate chalydon, &c. Lead however is the staple of this country. Many thousands of acres have already been found to contain this valuable article and there may be thousands if not millions more. In fact, the mining business is merely in its infancy. To give an idea of the value of land, one acre was bought in the land office for $1.25 and sold for $20,000, the buyer after all, realizing 80 per cent.

This we think was in 1837; and in the years 1836 or '7 13,343,150 pounds of lead were mined in the mines belonging to the United States, which, at 5 cts. per pound, amounts to $667,157.50. That from the private mines amounts to 8 times that sum. In discovering a mine, a shaft is sunk and then "drifted" east and west, this being the position in which the ore lies. This lead he said contained 45 per cent. of zinc. We do not recollect the exact amount of lead obtained the last year, but when he mentioned it, we were astonished. He said a man "in these diggings" could dig or produce $75 worth of lead per day. He exhibited to the audience some fine specimens of lead, zinc, iron, marble, &c. We examined an iron specimen picked up by Mr. Newhall near the Missouri river. It is certainly one of the finest specimens we have ever seen. A piece of honeycomb marble, a splendid specimen, singular and unique, was also exhibited. It would be a valuable acquisition to any cabinet. The piece of waving marble is very beautiful and highly polished, as also the other specimens.

"The Nauvoo Temple is a very singular and unique structure. It is 150 feet in length, 98 feet wide, and when finished will be 150 feet high. It is different from anything in ancient or modern history. Every thing about it is on a magnificent scale, and when finished and seen from the opposite side of the river, it will present one, if not the most beautiful, chaste, and noble specimens of architecture to be found in the world. We should like to be in possession of a model of this building, both on account of its great notoriety, as being connected with the Mormon or Latter Day Saints' religion, and also a work of art. Did our limits permit, we might give a very minute description of the whole order of architecture. This splendid drawing was exhibited by Mr. Newhall, while in Nauvoo, from a copy in the archives of that city. We wish he had taken it on a large scale, but he probably did not, on account of transportation. We regret exceedingly that we did not have the privilege of a near inspection of the map of the city of Nauvoo; the place which for some time past has created more intense interest perhaps, than any other city, town or village in the country, if not in the world. But on inquiring for it we found it had been rolled up and packed away. He gave a very glowing and interesting account of this city. The location is one of the most beautiful on earth. Situated on the Mississippi river, rising in an inclined plane, till it reaches the height where it overlooks an extensive tract of territory, unrivalled in richness and scenery. His account of the military displays in Nauvoo, where the regiment, or Joe Smith's legion as it is called, turns out, is very interesting and excellent. He spoke of the six ladies on horse, with white feathers or plumes waving over black velvet, riding up and down in front of the regiment. This must appear singular, at least to a Yankee.

He has had personal interviews with Joseph and to sum up his character in a word; he is a jolly fellow; and according to his view, he is one of the last persons on earth whom God would have raised up as a prophet or priest; he is so diametrically opposite to that which he ought to be, in order to merit the titles or to act in such offices. Among others, he is very sociable, easy, cheerful, kind and obliging, and very hospitable.

We have seen Hiram Smith, a brother of Joseph's and heard him preach, and conversed with him about his religion, its origin and progress; and we heard him declare, in this city in public, that what is recorded about the plates, &c. &c., is God's solemn truth. We have seen and conversed also with Mr. Wm. Law, one of the apostles. He declared to us in the Masonic Hall, in this city, that the statements are true, and called upon God with uplifted hands as a witness. We think it would be very interesting to the good people of Salem, and in fact to the whole Eastern States, to have the prophet come and make a visit. We very much doubt whether there is a man on earth, who would create so much excitement and deep interest, at least, for the time being, as the prophet.

After Mr. N. had drawn the Temple, Joseph was exceedingly pleased, pronounced it very correct, complimented him very highly, and told him he believed he would be the means in the hands of God, of doing a great deal of good.

Joseph's sermon, given verbatim as heard by Mr. N., is very interesting; but we cannot give it here.

Ladies' Veils.—The wearing of ladies' veils, says a celebrated writer on sight, permanently weakens many naturally good eyes, on account of the endeavor of the eye to adjust itself to the ceaseless vibration of that too common article of dress.

"Requiescat in pace."
Here lies, by death smitten,
A hapless young kitten,
To moulder away in the dust:
Oh! had it lived longer
It would have been stronger,
And died somewhat older, we trust.

Had it grown up to cat-hood,
Full many a rat would Have mourned in the deepest of woe.
Let the curtain be drawn to
We hope it has gone to
The land to which other cats go.

The following was the answer made by a gentleman to a young lady who had sent him a kiss—in a letter.

"Thanks to my gentle, absent friend—
A kiss you in your letter send,
But ah! the thrilling charm is lost
In kisses that arrive by post;
That fruit can only tasteful be
When gathered, melting, from the tree!

SHERMAN'S MEDICATED LOZENGES.

THESE celebrated Lozenges are now offered to the citizens of Nauvoo and the West, as the best preparations (for the cure of the various diseases for which they are recommended) ever offered to the public. The proprietor, Dr. Sherman, is a regular graduate of Medicine, a member of the Medical Society of the city and county of New York, and these Lozenges are prepared from medical prescriptions which have been approved by the most celebrated physicians in that city; in addition to which they are prepared in so pleasant a manner that children eat them with avidity and cry for more. They consist of

COUGH LOZENGES.
Which are the safest and most effectual remedy for Coughs, Colds, Consumption, Whooping Cough, Asthma, &c., ever offered to the public. They operate by promoting expectoration, allaying the irritation of coughing, and removing the cause of the disease.

WORM LOZENGES.
The only infallible Worm medicine ever discovered. In over 400,000 cases they have never been known to fail. Many diseases arise from worms and occasion long and intense suffering and even death without their ever being suspected; grown persons are very often afflicted with them, and are doctored for various complaints, without any benefit, when one dose of these Lozenges would speedily cure them.

CAMPBELL LOZENGES.

THE REVEREND DEAD.

THE DEAD! the reverend dead!
Let not oblivion spread Over their dust,
And their good deeds, her pall!
No, let us cherish all
Their names, and here recall
The sainted just.
Fresh, from their sepulcher,
The thought of what they were Comes, like the breath
Of the young flowers, that grow
Around their graves, and throw
Their fragrance o'er the blow,
Dark house of death.
The memory of the good,
Who at the altar stood,
Faithful and true,
In holier, in our eyes,
Than are the stars, that rise
To give us, from the skies,
Their light and dew.
Souls of our brethren blest,
Who've entered on your rest,
Design ye to know,
As round the throne ye rise,
In "sweet societies,"
How, by the good and wise,
Ye've loved below!
God of the rolling years,
Guide of the circling spheres—
Planets and suns—
Clothe us, like them, in light;
Lead us, like them, aright;
Keep us in courses bright,
Thy holy ones!

CHAPTER VIII.—THE ARREST.

While the events of the last chapter were transpiring, a tall, slim, spindle-legged personage was seated in the bar-room of a hotel, some eight miles distant from the place where we last had an account of him, in the village of—. He was stretched backward in his chair, in a kind of consequential attitude—the edge of his hat's cavity circled round from the crown of his head to that part of the forehead where his intellectual rudder made its insertion into the cranium, throwing his hat into a slant or diagonal position—his legs extended to the farther side of the fire-place, as if to prevent the introduction of intruders—and twirled an ivory tooth-pick in his fingers which he sometimes employed with considerable dexterity in the cavity of his broad mouth, which was now and then distorted into a kind of good natured grin, as if pleased with his own meditations.

"Ha, ha," soliloquized Dick Spindle, "Now I've got Fly-Devil into safe keeping, I'll leave him to take passage on the 'Sly Coaster,' while I go back and see how fares that 'fair one,' and introduce her to a new order of things with which she seems to be entirely unacquainted. Bill Bisby will soon cause Fly-Devil to find the sea shore and make him acquainted with the way they do up things upon the other side."

At this juncture, the door slowly opened and this soliloquy was interrupted by the entrance of five or six men. Dick was considerably alarmed, but maintained his equilibrium with remarkable coolness.

"Is this the individual?" enquired a thick set man, pointing to Dick, at the same time turning to a hard-faced, worldly looking, business appearing person at his side.

"I recognize him as the individual, sir."

"You are my prisoner," continued the first speaker, approaching Dick, at the same time placing his hand upon his shoulder.

"Hold, blackguards! what kind of treatment is this to a gentleman? You'd better run home and take a few lessons on manners before you attempt to move in high circles. Do you generally introduce yourselves to strangers in these parts by laying hold of the collar instead of the hand? And do you present that kind of a letter of introduction instead of a nicely printed card, edged with gold-leaf and substantially glazed?" enquired Dick with a haughty sneer, pointing at the writ which the sheriff drew from his hat and prepared to read.

"Come, Mr. Spindle," said the sheriff, after reading the writ, "you see that this is a 'card' that will insure you comfortable lodgings in the county jail for the night, and present you before your betters to-morrow for examination; so just put your arm in mine and I'll contrive to lessen your expenses by bidding this hotel good night and leading you to a place where you can get sleep without paying for it."

"I'm no ways scrimped, Mr. Sheriff, and besides, I think the interest you manifest in my welfare—though upon some occasions it might prove beneficial—is, at the present, rather annoying to a gentleman who wishes to be left alone to his meditations. You will oblige me very much, gentlemen, if you will rid me of this impertinent clown by just showing him the way home, where I would advise him to stay until he can learn to appear a little more agreeable in company."

"If we can't persuade you to go by fair argument, we will by—"

"Foul," you would say; so here is the most conclusive one," said Dick interrupting him, as he rose to his feet and planted his fist over his right eye with a velocity that sent the sheriff against the ceiling.

A scuffle now ensued between Dick and the by-standers, in which he attempted to escape; but the superior numbers he had to contend with at length overpowered him, and Dick Spindle was soon incarcerated within the firm walls of a prison.

CHAPTER IX.—THE BROTHER AND SISTER.

Four days of indescribable anxiety had passed, and Calmer was no more the healthy, fresh looking person he was once. Thin and emaciated, he was looked upon by his friends with alarm and the most intense anxiety. No more did he mingle in the merry circle, and join in the giddy dance; no more were the cheerful tones of his voice heard to reverberate along the gay saloon of fashionable society; but his whole soul, his every energy of mind, were all concentrated in the pursuit of one great and absorbing object. Carmelia was the only person that engrossed his attention, and he exerted every faculty he possessed in endeavoring to discover whether she had been taken. Searches were instituted; the country was flooded with advertisements, and every subterfuge was grasped after which presented the least possibility of leading to a discovery.

But every energy thus far proved abortive; every plan which his untiring industry instituted, and every device to which he resorted were baffled. No hope now presented itself to his mind; all was a dark and fearful mystery; and, of her release, all was doubt and uncertainty. To allay the storm of contending hopes and fears that were raging in his bosom, he repaired to the grave of De Benion. He approached—a tiny form was bending over it. It was little Nett, and thus brother and sister stood by the grave of Carmelia's father.

"Brother, what makes you look so pale? Can Nett do any thing to make you well?" enquired the sister affectionally.

"Innocent creature!" exclaimed the brother, clasping that slender form in his arms, and kissing away the tear that trembled in her bright blue eye. "How little do you know of sorrow, and the miseries of human life! But tell me, my little angel, what brought you to this sacred place? Has a grave yard, with its solemn tombs, any charms for Nett?"

"Do you see the flowers I have thrown upon the grave?"

"Well, what do they mean, pretty one?"

"Pappy De Benion was always so good to little Nett, that I thought if I would cover his grave with pretty flowers his spirit would send Carmelia back to us again."

"Then does Nett care for Carmelia?"

"She was always so kind to me and said I was her adopted sister. Will Pappy send her back before all these nice roses are gone? I shall be so sorry when it's winter!—then there won't be any flowers to give to Pappy."

"Surely heaven has sent you to be a comforting angel to me in this great affliction!"

When they returned home they found an old man waiting to see Calmer. They stepped one side; and, as the old man commenced conversation, Calmer's eye sparkled with delight.

CHAPTER X.—THE ADVERTISEMENT.

"If that old money-bugger don't come back to night he'll find his pet bird has flown and left him nothing but her nest," said Jack Swaghammer to his comrades, who were assembled in the back room of the Miser's dwelling.

"Her crop by this time must be as small as a humming-bird's. If people wasn't so mighty suspicious now-a-days, Jack, you could fly over the country with this fine plumed little songster, and no thanks to Dick Spindle and this stingy old nabob for their kindness to her. But I've been like a fish out of water ever since the old money-lover read that advertisement."

"What advertisement?"

"Hain't you seen it?"

"No."

"Here it is, in the last 'Colonist' that arrived yesterday."

Jack took the paper and spied an advertisement round which a black line had been drawn with a pen to attract attention. It read as follows:

$1000.

THE undersigned will pay the above sum to any person who will furnish correct information of the fate of Miss Carmelia De Benion, who has been forcibly taken from her friends by some unknown hand.

CALMER MORTON.

May 29, 1799.

"Blood and thunder!" roared Jack, as he concluded the notice. "We'll all be sent to Davy Jones' locker before night, or I'm a fool! You must be as easy as your Great Grandmother's old shoe, or you'd played 'hark from the tomb' on the old sinner's carcass before he left the house. He'd sell his very heart's blood for money!"

The whole group seemed riveted to their seats with amazement, and Jack continued to run through the columns of the paper.

"By the Holy Virgin! Here it comes like peals of thunder from the very trump of heaven!" exclaimed Jack, as he commenced reading the 'leading article' under the editorial head. It ran thus:

"RICHARD SPINDLE.

This individual was arrested in our town last evening, charged with having passed counterfeit money upon Mr. Snider, a respectable merchant of this place. He was brought before the court of enquiry at 10 o'clock this morning; and, the court deeming the evidence conclusive, he was held in custody for his trial at the higher court. In our opinion, the evidence was so strong against him, he cannot avoid a sentence to the Penitentiary for a term of not less than fifteen years. It is time a stop was put to this high-handed and abominable practice of counterfeiting, and it becomes the imperative duty of every good citizen to exert all their energy to bring those who practice it to condign punishment. It is suspected that Spindle is connected with a gang of murderers who infest these mountains, and who have been in the habit, for a long time, of running off the property of peaceable citizens to the sea coast and shipping it aboard of some vessel favorable to their cause. Let the people be vigilant and active, and the time is not far distant when these rascals will be effectually driven from our country."

"The story is told for poor Dick," continued Jack as he concluded the article. "Ha, ha, Dick has gone and I am the sole heir to the legacy he has left. I will prepare to assert my right to the hereditament this very night. Where there is no will, as a matter of course, the heirs come in for the estate. And who is a nearer heir than Jack Swaghammer, who fought for the prize in the first place. Ho, ho, ho, it's a long road that never turns."

"Truly spoken, Jack; and from the omens which now appear to hover round us, we will all arrive at the turn in our road before we are prepared for it."

"The signers a dozen to one against us," replied Jack, "so I'll just take a walk out and see if I can discover any signs of hostility. 'Straws show which way the wind blows.'"

CHAPTER XI.—THE RESCUE.

A long train of men might have been seen ascending a declivity near which the house of the Miser was situated. Their panoply shone in the translucent rays of the sun, which was fast sinking behind the western hills. At their head was a short, round shouldered, pointed nosed, old man, who seemed to officiate in the capacity of a guide, rather than as a commander. They wound around behind the brink of the hill as much as possible, evidently to screen themselves from observation. On a sudden the old man halted. His small dark eye was stationary upon something dark colored, which seemed to resemble the figure of a man half concealed by the branches of some small trees a few hundred yards in their advance.

"Yes—yes—it looks like—it is—U'm, sure it is—now—there—see—he's shot away towards the house like a javelin hurled by the scienced arm of some Royal Knight. We're discovered; the quicker we are on the move the better, or we'll have nothing to surround but the naked walls. Do you promise that it will be paid in gold?" continued the guide, in a lower tone, as he turned and placed his mouth close to the ear of a pale faced young man who was the commander of the train.

"Yes, in gold," was the reply, and they moved forward at a rapid pace.

"Death and fury!" roared the spy, bursting into the room. "They're down upon us like an avalanche! We'll all be eat alive, as lambs in the sheep fold by a posse of wolves, unless we all fight like devils! Hollo there, leather heads! Put on your pistols; meet them at the threshold, and dispute the old traitor's right to enter! As for me, I'll swear he shan't see the inside of these walls unless he lifts his old limbs over my dead body!"

By this time the house was surrounded and the men were fast rushing to the door.

"Follow on!" shouted the commander. "We must see that the sheriff is not molested in the performance of his official duty."

"You are my prisoners," said the sheriff in a calm voice as he approached the door.

"We'll have a drawn game for that," replied the ruffian, discharging his pistol at the sheriff without effect. "Bah! old fool! I've got one reserved for you! Here, take the reward of your handiwork," continued he, burying the contents of his other pistol in the breast of the Miser.

"And here is yours," said Calmer coolly, and Jack Swaghammer—Calmer's captor—fell. His blood mingled with that of the Miser, and ran in one broad stream across the floor.

The men now rushed in to secure the others; but they, seeing the fate of their principal and the determination and superior number of their assailants, were fast escaping through the back door. The anxiety that was felt by the men, on hearing the discharge of the pieces, caused them to rush to the scene of contest; thus breaking up the line, and leaving a wide vacancy through which the counterfeiters effected an escape.

The Miser was struggling in the agonies of death. His voice was nearly extinct. He beckoned Calmer to his side.

"Gold," faintly articulated the dying man, "has been the only God I have worshipped through life. My propensity for it has been irresistible, and that I might hoard it up in useless heaps, I have often turned from the path of honesty. This band of men have been liberal with their money, which has induced me to give them a shelter in my house, and conceal their wicked occupation from the world. I have never acted with them further than to conceal their plundered gain, for which I always received a reward. Even now my love of gold is so strong that I would ring from you the sum I was to receive, if there were any hopes that I could carry it into heaven! This has brought death to me—happiness to you! My pocket contains the keys that will lead you to my treasures and to your affianced! She is yours—they are willing to the little girl who was so anxious for the escape of 'sissy Carmelia,' as she called her."

The door quickly opened—Carmelia was in the arms of Calmer!

Thus, Carmelia was your prayer answered; Calmer was restored to you in the very room where it was initiated. In that moment of deliverance was the divine promise verified—"Put your trust in me and I will deliver."

The thankful couple were in the presence of the Miser. A faint smile of pleasure played upon his cheek as he beheld them, and the Miser soon after expired.

CHAPTER XII.—THE WEDDING.

On a fine evening in the latter part of June, a gay party was assembled in the magnificent parlor of Calmer Morton. That company was composed of those individuals who had been the early friends of Calmer and the fair and happy being who was seated by his side. Deep felt gratitude was depicted on every countenance—every cheek was flushed with feelings of transport, and every eye beamed with rapturous delight. Soon a dead silence reigned throughout the illuminated mansion; but it was the silence of breathless interest. The bride and bridegroom were before the altar. The few weeks that had elapsed since the date of the last chapter, had spread the bloom of health upon their cheeks—swept away that stern look of settled melancholy, and placed there the joyous smile of happiness in its stead. Close to that young couple stood the lovely little Nett. She was gazing with delight upon a fresh rose that was fastened to the belt of the bride, which the company insisted she should wear to satisfy the innocent notion of the little girl.

Why need we dwell longer upon the sequel of this story? Suffice it to say they were married; and, reader, when we incorporate this short word in the history of Calmer and Carmelia, we trust we are conveying more infinite satisfaction to you, than we would be in swelling out the most lengthy volume without it. But through what scenes of trial have we been obliged to pass to arrive at the place where it can be introduced! What disappointments have ensued—what sudden reverses of fortune has it been our destiny to witness—what instant transitions from joy to misery—what emotions of sorrow have been felt—what pungent feelings have been awakened—what keen solicitude has been kindled—but the introduction of this word dissipates them all—pours the balm of reconciliation upon the troubled spirits of the reader, and, what is far better than all, it brings the full fruition of happiness to the wedded pair!

The next day Calmer and Carmelia Morton, accompanied by little Nett, were seated upon a superb sofa in their splendidly furnished parlor. Carmelia's snowy hand swept over the notes of an elegant piano, and the room vibrated with modulated music.

"Love is dearer when its fruits are reaped after passing through the tempest," thought the husband.

"Happiness is better appreciated when the 'bitter cup' has been dashed empty from our lips," was the sentiment of the wife.

"Now all is well with Nett—all around is joy and sunshine," betokened the rosy cheeked girl, as she looked full in the face of "THE RESCUED BRIDE."

The Grey Mare is the better Horse.

Most of our readers have heard this expression, and are at no loss for its solution, but many may not be aware of its origin. In the hope that it may amuse and prove profitable to them, we give the story as follows. An English Gentleman having married a young lady who was handsome, accomplished and rich, expected to reap the harvest of matrimonial felicity; but he soon found that she was of a high domineering spirit, always contending to be mistress of him and his family; and he therefore resolved to part with her. He went to her father, and told him she found his daughter of such a temper, and was so heartily tired of her; that if he could replace her in her former home, he would return her every penny of her fortune.—The old gentleman having enquired into the causes of his complaint, asked him why he should be more disquieted at this than any other married man, since it was a common occurrence with them, and consequently no more than he ought to have expected; the husband said he was so far from giving his assent to this assertion, that he thought himself more unhappy than any other man, as his wife had a very attractive spirit, and certainly no man who had a due sense of right and wrong would ever submit to be governed by his wife. "Sir," said the old man, "you are little acquainted with the world, if you do not know that all women govern their husbands, though not all indeed by the same method. However, to end all disputes between us, I will put what I have said on this point, if you are willing to try it. I have five horses in my stable; you shall harness them to a cart, in which I will put a basket containing one hundred eggs; and if in passing through the country, and making a strict inquiry into the truth of falsehood of my assertion, and leaving a horse at the house of every man who is master of his family, himself, and an egg only where the wife governs, you shall find your eggs gone before your horses. I hope you will then think your own case not uncommon, but will be contented to go home, and look upon your wife as no more than her neighbors; if, on the other hand, your horses are gone first, I will take my daughter home again, and you shall keep her fortune. This proposal was too advantageous to be rejected, the young man therefore set out with great eagerness to get rid, as he thought, of his horses and his wife. At the first house that he saw, he heard a woman, with a shrill angry voice, call her husband to go to the door. Here he left an egg, you may be sure, without making further inquiry. At the next he met with something of the same kind, and at every ordinary house, in short, until his eggs were almost gone; when he arrived at the seat of a gentleman of family and figure in the country; he knocked at the door, and, inquiring for the master of the house, he was told by a servant that his master was not yet stirring, but that his lady was in the parlour; the wife with great complaisance, desired him to seat himself, and said if his business was very urgent, she would wake her husband, to let him know it, but would much rather not disturb him. "Really madam," said he, "my business is only to ask a question which you can solve as well as your husband, if you will be ingenious with me; you will do, I think it odd, and it may be deemed impolite for a stranger to be so free; but, as a great wager depends upon it, and it may be some advantage to yourself to declare the truth to me, I hope these considerations will plead my excuse; what I wish to know is—whether you govern your husband, or he rules over you." "Indeed sir," replied the lady, "that is an odd question, but as I think no one ought to be ashamed of acting rightly, I shall not scruple to say that I have been always proud to obey my husband in all things, but if a woman's own word is to be suspected in such a case, let him answer me, for here he comes."

The gentleman at that moment entered the room, and confirmed every word his obedient wife had reported in her favor; upon which he was requested to choose which horse in the team he liked best, and to accept it as a present. A black gelding struck the fancy of the gentleman most; but the lady desired he would choose the grey mare, which she thought would be fit for her side saddle; her husband gave substantial reasons why the black horse would be the most useful to them; but madam still persisted in her claim to the grey mare. "What said she, and will not take her then? But I say you shall, for I am sure the grey mare is much better than the horse. Well my dear, replied the husband, if you will have it so, I must give way. You must take an egg, replied the gentleman, and I must take all my horses back, and endeavor to live in peace and harmony with my wife.

Healing Plaster.—At the recent term of the common pleas in Harrison county, Ohio, Esther Ann Davis procured a verdict of $2,000 against J. Holmes, for a breach of promise of Marriage.

Barbarous Outrage.—It is stated for truth in the papers, that some two weeks ago a gang of twelve or fifteen white ruffians broke into the house of a colored man living in an alley in Wheeling, and violated the person of his wife so inhumanly, that the poor woman died from the injuries she then sustained. Several of the scamps were recognized at the time by a colored man, who happened to come along. This story we did not publish at the time because it looked so improbable, but from some late intelligence we incline to believe it true. We hope the villains will be summarily dealt with.

A Practical Joke.—A gentleman of considerable talent as an orator became a member of a legislative body in one of the eastern states. In speaking, he was addicted to an old habit of handling his spectacles; first placing them on his nose, suffering them to remain a minute or two, throwing them upon his forehead, finally folding them up and laying them before him upon the desk. One day, a very important question came up for consideration, and he commenced a speech in opposition. A friend to the proposed measure, who was a most incorrigible wag withal, determined to spoil the effect of the honorable member's remarks, and accordingly, before he entered the house, provided himself with a dozen pairs of spectacles. The member commenced his speech with his usual ability. Only a few minutes had elapsed before he was at work with his spectacles and finally got them upon his forehead. At this juncture, our wag, who stood ready, laid another pair upon the desk before the speaker. These were taken up, and by regular graduation, gained a place on his forehead, by the side of the others. A third, fourth and fifth were disposed of, in the same manner. A smile settled upon the countenances of the honorable members, which gradually lengthened into a grin; and at last, when the speaker had warmed into one of his most patriotic and eloquent sentences, he deposited a sixth pair with the others, and there was one long and loud peal of laughter from all quarters of the hall—president, clerks, and members joined in chorus. The speaker himself looked around in astonishment at this curious interruption but, accordingly, raising his hand, he grasped the spectacles and the whole force of the joke rushed upon his mind. He dashed the glasses upon the floor, took up his hat, and left the hall. The bill passed by a triumphant majority, probably in consequence of the gentleman's very silly and useless habit.

Foreign.

FROM TEXAS.

The steamship Neptune arrived at New Orleans on the 25th of May from Galveston, bringing advices to the 23rd. The Galveston papers publish letters from Commodore Moore and Mr. Morgan, the Texan Commissioner, written at Campeachy on the 10th, and justifying the conduct of the former. Mr. Morgan assumes all the responsibility, declaring that the Commodore had his entire sanction for all that he did; and he labors to show that the presence of the Texan vessels was of infinite service to the cause as well of Texas as of Yucatan. Commodore Moore writes that the conduct of the Yucatecos to him is perfectly satisfactory; that the Yucateco gun-boats are under his exclusive command, and that as soon as he gets a breeze he shall surely attack the Mexican vessels and "whip them in a short fight."

"The position that I have been in for the last month with the constituted authorities of the country of my adoption, is one of a most peculiar nature. I have assumed tremendous responsibilities to keep inviolate, so far as the Navy was concerned, the faith of Texas—I am accused of disobedience of orders, when I received orders that it was impossible to execute, and I am accused of fitting out a piratical expedition, when in fact I was making every sacrifice and straining every nerve to get the vessels to sea in a fighting condition, which I did at length accomplish, and what I have done has been done for the good of the country, for I felt confident, that with the force under my command I would check them at last, and let them see that Texas would yet meet them, and neither be whipped or subdued by treachery. If I get a breeze, with the force I have here, they are whipped in a short fight, and they have had repeated chances within the last ten days and nights to attack us when it was calm or nearly so, which they have invariably let alone."

The conferences between the Mexican and Yucatan generals had been broken off, and hostilities were declared against the order of the day.

A large meeting of citizens was held at Galveston on the 20th of May, at which resolutions warmly sustaining and applauding the course of Commodore Moore were adopted.

IMPORTANT FROM CAMPEACHY.

The N. O. Picayune of the 27th ult., in a Second Edition, contains intelligence from Campeachy, brought by the schooner Rosario. It seems that Commodore Moore of the Texan Navy, has had an engagement with the two Mexican war-steamer—which resulted in his withdrawal from the action, without any decided victory on either side—so far at least as appears at present. To the Commodore himself—to say nothing of the Republic to which he belongs—the affair, especially its result, was of decided importance. He entered into it in direct violation of the peremptory commands of his Government, and nothing but success can save him from summary and severe punishment if he return—which he would not be likely to do. Should he prove completely victorious he would probably be able to set at defiance President Houston, put himself at the head of the opposition party and become his successor in the Presidential chair. The following is the letter in the Picayune, giving the account of the action. It is written by one of the officers on board the Texan vessel Wharton, and must be received, therefore, as the most favorable side of the story:

"OFF CAMPEACHY, May 17, 1843.

At 11 o'clock on the morning of the 10th, Com. Moore made signal to attack the enemy, then about a mile and a half to windward, or rather seaward of us. This we soon answered, and brought our long Tom to bear on the iron steamer Gaudaloupe, the Commodore at the same time engaging the Montezuma. The action here continued hot and heavy for about two hours, changing our position but very little, and the steamers occasionally hauling off to repair damages, or to try and get at such a distance as would be too great for our shot; but as they shortly afterwards returned to the fight, I am induced to believe they hauled off to repair damages. (On one of these occasions, when the Montezuma, after receiving a brisk fire from the Commodore, hauled off and stood away, the Commodore finding himself within range also of the Gaudaloupe, opened his fire on her, and with the first shot carried away her signal staff, which dropped gracefully over her taffrail. The sea breeze about this time sprang up, and the action again became general—the Commodore engaging the Montezuma, and our little beauty the Gaudaloupe.

The action now, as well as the day, became very hot; shot flew around us in every direction, but none of them took the least effect, while our shot, I am sure, done immense damage. We have not been able to ascertain to a certainty, but all are of opinion on board that we damaged the machinery of the Gaudaloupe very materially. One thing is certain, she was enveloped in her own steam for some time, and was seen afterwards to work with one wheel. About half-past 3, P. M., the attention of the steamers seemed directed to the Commodore, and they rarely deigned to give us a shot, although we kept up a very brisk fire on both. About 2 o'clock one of our seamen was blown to atoms by the gun at which he was engaged. He was ramming home the cartridge, and the captain of the gun not seeing him at the muzzle, fired, and blew the man to pieces. From this time to 3 o'clock, the action became general, and very hot. The Commodore received several shots in his hull and bulwarks.

At 3 the steamers hauled off and the Commodore, having received a shot between wind and water, which caused his vessel to leak much, wore ship and stood back for the anchorage. He made signal for us also to withdraw from the action. We gave the Gaudaloupe a parting broadside and followed in the wake of the ship. At 4, came to anchor off Campeachy, where we learned the ship had received fifteen shot. She was shot in almost every direction, below and aloft; yet what is most miraculous, did not lose a single spar. She had two killed and twenty five wounded; among the latter, is Lieut. Wilbur and Midshipman Bryant. A number of amputations have taken place—a great pity, as a better or braver crew never trod a deck.

It was with great reluctance we withdrew from the action; but the magazine of the flag ship had 25 inches of water in it, and as they had no powder it was useless to remain a target for the enemy. The Mexicans seemed very glad that the day's work had terminated, as they did not make the least effort to follow up the engagement.

The loss on their side must be very great, as at the commencement of the action, their decks were lined with men. I am quite confident that if the action had lasted one hour longer, and we could get a little closer to them than we were, we would have captured them."

The Picayune says that Com. Boylan, though in sight of the contending parties, kept a safe distance from their shot, and the gallant band of Texans had to rely on their own unaided valor in their contest with the enemy. Another account however says Captain Boylan acted most nobly in the hottest and thickest of the fray—he and his gun boats stuck to Commodore Moore as closely as mortar adheres to brick, and that not a few of the enemy fell to his well directed fires. On shore the troops of Yucatan and Mexico have not been idle. They kept "blazing" away at one another on the days of the 18th and 19th. The loss on the side of the Centrals was supposed to be great. The Yucatecos had only ten killed.

It is supposed that not less than sixty men were killed on board the Gaudaloupe and Montezuma during the naval action.

The Extra Tropic of the 27th contains a long official account of the action by Commodore Moore, which, as it is confined to the details and particulars of the manœuvres of each vessel, we think it not worth while to copy. So far as we can judge the Texan squadron does not seem to have covered itself so completely with glory as Commodore Moore's previous boast intimated it would. The Texans admit they were the first to retire from the combat, and their reception was evidently more sharp and warm than they had expected. We half suspect, moreover, that the importance of the action has been considerably magnified by Texan accounts. Campeachy papers have been received at New Orleans, bearing date five days after the battle, and the notice they take of it is very slight. "The Texans," they say, "conducted themselves in the most gallant manner. Let the Gaudaloupe say the contrary! The Mexican squadron could not long continue to resist in spite of the advantages of numbers and discipline of vessels. The Yucatecos are not usually modest in their pretensions, and if the action had really been of the importance claimed for it they would not have passed it over with a single paragraph. We publish the following letter from Com. Moore to the Editors of the Tropic. If he can again get near them he is confident he will tell a big tale in a few minutes." He keeps up good courage at all events.

"TEXAN SLOOP OF WAR, AUSTIN."

Off Campeachy, May 10, 1843.

Messrs. Editors: I wrote you on the 5th inst., enclosing you a copy of the minutes of the action of the 8th of April.

I herewith enclose you a copy of the minutes of our action of the 10th inst.,—the wind was so light, that at no time were we nearer than a mile and three quarters. The advantage of steam and heavy guns is tremendous, particularly in the Gulf of Mexico, in the summer, where there is so much light weather. The whole fire of both steamers was directed at this ship; not a shot struck the brig. We fired over five hundred cartridges, and the long gun from the Wharton, (obtained since we arrived here,) was fired sixty five times, and repeatedly with great effect. When the sea breeze came in, the brig was caught aback, and before she got round on the same track, we were some distance ahead, because we could not heave to, as we would have run the risk of being raked; she however made sail, and soon got within gun shot again. I forgot to mention that I have obtained, since my arrival, two long 18 pounders, which have been of great service.

Our crew behaved nobly! a finer set of men were never on board ship; and as to the officers under my command, it would be impossible for me to express to you my admiration of their conduct and bearing.

The Gaudaloupe was very much crippled, and when we wore, to stand in for anchorage, she did not move her wheels for over forty minutes; she was however to windward, and we could not get up to her; one of the shell shot struck the Gaudaloupe about the wheel, which must have done her considerable injury. I have fired but very few of them, owing to the distance they have always kept from us. I am reserving them for close quarters.

On the 17th and 18th there was brisk firing kept upon both sides on shore, and the gun boats took a hand—the Mexicans have taken a position in the suburb of San Roma, which they were compelled to evacuate this morning. I was on the walls yesterday for about an hour, and the musket balls were whizzing a small few, and many were injured on either side. I imagine they were not less than five or six hundred yards apart.

I also enclose you a copy of the surgeon's report of killed and wounded. Frederick Shepherd was one of the crew of the San Antonio; he was confined on board this ship from the 11th March, 1842, until his acquittal and release; he was captain of No. 5 gun, and most nobly had the poor fellow redeemed his character from the charge of participating in the mutiny on board that ill fated vessel—for a better I had not on board the vessel.

The wounded men are doing well; several of them are in the hospital at Campeachy, and the Governor is very urgent that they should be sent on shore; (two men have had their arms amputated, and one a leg—Thos. Barnett and John Norris an arm, and Owen Timothy a leg) but the surgeon prefers keeping them on board, at least for the present.

Those 68 pound balls are tremendous missiles, and the way they did whistle or rather hum over our heads was caution. I tell you. They fired a great many over the poop where I was standing; and several of them were disposed to be rather too intimate.

I will be ready to give them another chance in a few days, but I will wait for a strong breeze, and if I can get near enough to use our shell shot, I feel confident that they will tell a big tale in a few minutes.

A fisherman came in this afternoon, and said that he had been alongside the Gaudaloupe to-day, and that she had forty seven men killed and thirty wounded; he also said that nearly all the men were on board the Gaudaloupe for the purpose of boarding this ship, which, by the way, they had a fair chance of doing, for, during the four hours' fight, we chased them not less than twelve or fourteen miles.

Yours, truly,

E. W. MOORE."

FROM HAVANA—INSURRECTION OF THE NEGROES.

The Picayune of the 27th ult., contains news from Havana of considerable importance. It was brought by the Alabama; and on the day previous to her sailing intelligence reached Havana, bringing the melancholy intelligence of another insurrection among the negroes on the South side of the Island, in the immediate vicinity of St. Jago de Cuba. The plot appears to have been much more extensive and deeply organized than the outbreak at Cardinas, some five or six weeks ago, and much more desperate and bloody in its execution. A large number of planters, with their overseers and families, were the hapless victims of the infuriated blacks; considerable property was also destroyed. From the astounding report of the loss of life and property, as well as the extent of the plot of the insurgents, the Admiral of the Port, Gen. Ulloa, immediately dispatched a man-of-war steamer to the scene of riot, and orders were also given for a frigate, two brigs of war, and another steamer to follow with troops, without delay. Gen. Ulloa was going in command of the expedition.

The English steamer Tay had arrived at Havana, from St. Thomas. Passengers by her state that it was generally believed that on the occasion of the recent loss of the unfortunate Solway, the man at the helm was drunk, and the officer of the watch asleep when the vessel struck.

The yellow fever was prevailing, but as yet it has not caused any particular concern with the people. The rainy season was just setting in.

Agricultural.

From the Michigan State Journal. |
TARES IN WHEAT.

MR. EDITOR.—It is known perhaps to but few of the wheat growers in the state, that in addition to the many influences arising from different causes which have heretofore operated against the production of this staple article of the west, which experience in agriculture has never been able to obviate or avoid, incident more or less to all wheat growing districts, one other foe has made its appearance in this section of the country which if attended to in season is comparatively harmless, but which if neglected, will ultimately render the fertile plains of Michigan in a manner worthless for all wheat growing purposes.

This is a weed known as tare, which grows with the wheat, and may be seen in different fields of wheat in this country. It is readily discovered at a distance of several rods by those who are accustomed to seeing it, and may be distinguished from any other weed by those not acquainted with it; from its being about the same height of the wheat this season of the year, with a small white blossom on the top of the different stalks, and when thick upon the ground bears a slight resemblance to daisies while growing, the root of which will be found to be a bright red. This weed with the main stalk and several branches springing from the same root, makes its appearance early in the spring, and may be seen in blossom by the first of the present month, and continues to branch and blow, and seed until nearly harvest, when the whole stock becomes dry and harsh, little less so than briars.

Ripe seeds and fresh blows are often found upon the same stalk at the same time. Hundreds of seeds are produced from a single stalk, a part of which are gathered with the wheat, to be sown with seed or carried with manure again upon the land. The rest remains with the stubble, to grow only with the next crop of wheat or when the soil is prepared for a fall crop, and then to vegetate, must neither be too deep nor too shallow in the ground.

When the seed is covered too deep in the ground to vegetate; it will remain for years; when thrown up again it grows with great luxuriance.

The formidable effects of this weed are known only to those who have witnessed its influence upon fields of wheat when neglected until a remedy was too late.

Thousands of acres of the choicest wheat lands in Western New York, have become overrun with this weed, from an ignorance of its true character when it first made its appearance. Its nature when it becomes thickly seeded upon the ground, is to choke down the wheat, claiming for itself the prerogative of occupying the whole soil. The only practical method of destroying it, is to go through the wheat field and pull it out, a task not easily performed in large fields when thick upon the ground. But if there are fields of wheat too much filled with this weed, to make the weeding practicable, the wheat should be cut as close to the ground as possible, threshed upon the same field, and straw, chaff and screenings burned; the field should be ploughed and harrowed in September. In the spring a fine crop will cover the ground, which neither sheep nor hogs will touch. This may be ploughed under, and any kind of a spring crop put upon the land; continue the process for several years before sowing it to wheat again in the fall.

This weed is not indigenous to Michigan, but has been brought here from the older states, in wheat, clover seed, by birds, or from some more inexplicable source, and is insidiously creeping over the whole state. Look to it, farmers! Go through your wheat fields, search out the enemy with a scrutinizing eye, serve the writ of ejectment upon him without process of law; if permitted to enjoy his right, you will find eventually that his claim is stronger than a tax title, and if in the end he does not get a warrant deed of your whole farm, it will not be from any defect of title, or lack of effort on his part.

Many suppose this weed the original tare mentioned in the parable in the New Testament, but this we can neither prove nor deny. If indeed it is the same weed, while we can cordially subscribe to the doctrines of that blessed book, and devoutly reverence its divine author, an experience in agriculture has taught us not to "let the wheat and tares grow together until harvest, but to weed the crop."

MAKING SOAP.—A lady correspondent of the Tennessee Agriculturist in a discourse to farmers' daughters, has the following remarks on soap making. The fair authoress, in our opinion, would make a valuable contributor to some of our monthly magazines. Though the practical matter of fact, common sense character of her articles might not be deemed to come within the legitimate range of belles lettres, they would have the merit of being useful—and that is more than can be said of two-thirds of the stuff that makes up the pages of most of our popular monthlies. A young lady, either a farmer's daughter or a merchant's daughter, who intends to become a housewife, would profit infinitely more from an essay upon the soft soap of domestic economy, than from the whole tomes of the soft slobber of nauseating love tales and sentimental nonsense. But hear the lady.

"Among other things, let me tell you how to make soap. I do not know that I should have thought of naming this, if my ignorance of soap making had not troubled me exceedingly. At first I did not know the method, and depended on the old woman who lived with me to make it. I went to her when the soap-keg was almost empty, and told her we must have some as quick as possible. (Why, lor! Miss, now don't you see it ain't the right time of the moon?) I tried to persuade her that soap making and the moon were but very slightly connected, if the other part of the business was well conducted. It was however, to no purpose.—I had to wait till the right time came round before I could get my soap. After this, when I had the superintendence of a large family, I was obliged to buy it by the barrel, because I did not well understand the manufacture of the article; and I was really ashamed that such extra expense was caused by my ignorance. Sometimes there was too much lime in the ashes; then again not enough; sometimes it was too greasy, and sometimes it was any thing but what it ought to be. I tell you my experience in the matter, so that you may learn from your mothers now, and not have the trouble of learning when you ought to be making it. As I have given you so long a talk on this subject, I will add a receipt I found a short time ago in the Cultivator, vol. v. page 124. It may be of use to some of your mothers if not to you. Mr. Tomlinson writing to Judge Buel, says: 'My wife has no trouble about soap.—The grease is put into a cask and a strong lye added. During the year as the fat increases, more lye is stirred in, and all occasionally stirred with a stick that is kept in it.—By the time the cask is full the soap is made ready for use. It is made hard by boiling and adding a quart of fine salt to three gallons of soap. It is put into a tub to cool, and the froth scraped off. It is afterwards melted to a boiling heat, and a little turpentine added which improves the quality.'

"Some of you will think me a most unsentimental kind of a woman, when I advise you to learn how good bread, butter, coffee, pickles, puddings &c. are made; but you will have to learn sometime or by worse. Work with your own hands too, even if it should tarnish their whiteness a little: a man does not consider the beauty of a soft white hand a very strong recommendation, when he finds it has been kept for show and not for use. I think a young lady should be able to scour a kettle and grace a diamond."

LUCY.

BEES.—Hives should be looked into at this season and all the litter and filth which has accumulated on the platform should be brushed away. Bees often starve after this time of the year, and if the hive feels very light, it is prudent to feed them. Cheap honey, such as may be had for six cents a pound, will answer for them.

"Salt should be kept constantly on the platform, under the bees. They are fond of the article and it is fatal to worms. Catmint herbs are agreeable to bees, and some of them should be planted near the hives."

Houses, built to cover the hives, are a great nuisance. They afford a shelter to the bee moth, and it is not easy to destroy it when we have no ready access to the back of the hive.

Each hive should be set on a firm post four feet high. This should be so sheltered by some tree that the shade may cover the hive from 10 A. M. to 3 P. M. The post must be sawed off square, and a board 12 inches square, must be nailed on to it firmly. This will form the platform of the hive.

Cut no notch or door in the hive for the bees to enter but raise your hive one third of an inch high by means of smooth chips of that thickness, that the bees may have access on all sides. If you raise the hive higher, the bees are forced to go to the corner posts to climb up every time they go in. If you set the hive down closer they cannot enter.

It is well to visit your bees often in summer. If you come daily and behave civilly, they will consider you a friend, and you may cant up the hives with great ease without running any risk of being stung. You must not take a stranger with you. You will often find the moth worm crawling about the platform. He grows to be an inch in length when he can get good living. Destroy every one you see, and let there be no crevices for them to hide in or for the miller to lay her eggs. Every board should be smooth and sound outside.

Millers will be flattered about the hive by the first of July if not sooner. These lay their eggs in, or near the hive, when they dare to, and these are the parents of the bee-moth—the great destroyer of the bee. If you can induce these millers to fly into a blaze, which you may kindle near the hives in the evening, you will do well. We have heard that a dish of whey, set near the hive, will attract the miller and cause her to drown herself in it. This scheme is easily put in practice, and we hope our friends will try it.

We have made it our own practice, to visit our own bees every morning, and to cant and examine them. They would not let a stranger do it. We used to weigh some of our hives daily. One of middling size, in June, gained three pounds per day for seven days in succession.—Mrs. Ploughman.

SUGAR FROM CORN STALKS.

The following directions for its manufacture, furnished by Dr. Naudin, of Delaware, are clear and precise:

"The corn should be planted as broom-corn is commonly planted, very close in the row, probably a stalk every three or four inches. The tillage will be the same as for broom-corn. When the young ears begin to appear, it is necessary to pluck them off carefully, and to repeat the gathering as often as necessary, so as to prevent the formation of any grain. Because, if grain be allowed to form, it takes all the sugar from the stalks. About the time the corn begins to harden, the making of sugar should be begun. It is not necessary to say any thing about a proper mill to crush the stalk and separate the juice, because mills of the cheapest kind only should be employed now, until the business would fully warrant an expensive outlay. It would probably be found that the common cider mill, with plain cylindrical nuts, would be quite sufficient for a farmer who would raise a fourth or half an acre of corn for sugar, for his family, and this quantity would be quite sufficient for satisfactory experiment."

"When the juice is separated from the stalk, about a table spoonful of white wash, made of the best quick lime, and about the consistence of thick cream, should be added to each gallon of the juice, and then boiling should commence. The scum that rises should be carefully removed; and the juice, if this has been carefully conducted, will be quite clear and nearly colorless. Then commences the process of evaporation; and when the juice has boiled down in about the proportion of eight gallons to one, the boiling will be completed, and it may be poured out into a shallow light wooden box to grain.

"It has been ascertained, although as yet the reason is unknown, that if the juice be boiled in a deep vessel, like the common cooking vessel, sugar will seldom be obtained; while if it be done in a shallow vessel, so that the juice at the commencement of the boiling shall not be more than three to five inches deep, sugar would be obtained without difficulty. It has been ascertained also that the sugar from corn will not grain so readily as that from the sugar-cane. And in some instances it has remained more than a week after the boiling before the sugar was formed, and yet excellent sugar made."

"It should be particularly remembered that the juice should be boiled as soon as separated from the stalk. It becomes acid very soon, and no sugar can be made if the juice be allowed to stand two or three hours before it is boiled. The juice will even spoil in the stalk before it is ground, if the stalk be cut off a few hours before grinding. It is necessary then that every part of the process should be done with the greatest dispatch. The stalks should be brought to the mill as soon as cut, and ground immediately. The vessel for boiling out to be properly filled in an hour or at most two hours' grinding. And the process of boiling down should immediately commence and be continued until completed."

"Excellent syrup, superior to the best molasses, will be obtained by observing the above directions, and boiling five gallons of juice to one gallon."

"The juice of the corn-stalk is very rich in sugar, when cultivated in the manner suggested. Tested by Beaume's saccharometer, the instrument used to measure the strength of syrups, the corn-stalk weighs 10 to 10.1-2 degrees, which is about the weight of the juice of the best cane in the West Indies, and is richer than the juice of the cane in Louisiana, which is seldom heavier than 8 degrees."

"One gallon of juice will produce nearly 1 1-4 pounds of sugar; and an acre of good corn will yield, from 700 to 1000 gallons of juice."

THE NEIGHBOR.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 28, 1843.

4TH OF JULY CELEBRATION, AT NAUVOO.

By the counsel and advice of President Hyrum Smith, Messrs. O. Hyde and G. J. Adams, who have been appointed to go on a mission to Russia, will deliver two addresses upon the subject of our holy religion, for the benefit and edification, not only of our own citizens, but also for strangers, who may be pleased to visit our town on that day. The morning's address by Mr. Hyde, at half past 10 o'clock, and the afternoon's by Mr. Adams at 2 o'clock. From the circumstances under which we are placed, this course is thought far more advisable for all who wish to be considered saints to assemble for religious worship, and collectively offer up our prayers to Almighty God for peace and prosperity to attend us as a people. The giddy and unthinking will no doubt resort to public dinners, festivals, and perhaps to the ball chamber, to spend their time and money to gratify their appetite and vanity, but no true hearted saint at this peculiar moment will do it.

At the close of each address, a collection will be taken for the especial purpose of assisting to complete Elder Hyde's house, that he may be the sooner liberated to proceed on his important mission to St. Petersburg. He who has money to spend on that day, can spend it more to the glory of God in the above manner, than after the custom and practice of the corrupt age in which we live. It is hoped that the band and choir will favour us on that occasion.

Lectures to be delivered in the grove near the Temple, where seats are provided.

TO THE ENGLISH BRETHREN IN NAUVOO.

Beloved Brethren and fellow countrymen.—Allow me to address you a few moments, through the medium of the press, and give me credit for my sincerity when I declare that I am actuated by no other motive than your welfare. I have seen a feeling of disaffection manifested by a few among you which I am persuaded has arisen from want of mature deliberation, and a knowledge of things as they really are. I am most decidedly opposed to oppression in every form; and if any of us are, or consider ourselves oppressed, let us take wise and discreet steps to have our grievances redressed. We none of us expected to find an entirely new country abounding in all the superfluities of England. Neither do we now believe that any place there do we now believe that any place situated as Nauvoo is, and these mostly pouring in continually, and have abundance of money or other things which are most desirable. But we were told before we started from our homes that we must expect difficulties and privations, and I am persuaded we most of us made up our minds that we would cheerfully bear all things for Christ's sake and the gospel, in order to build up a city in which we might learn righteousness, and live by every word that proceeds forth from the mouth of the Lord. Has not the man whom God has raised up to lead his people, been a man of many sorrows, and shall we add another thorn by acting unwisely? Rather let us lift up his hands that he may be strong in the Lord, by our being firmly united, and zealous for the truth. How good and how pleasant a thing it is for brethren to dwell together in love, when we can look upon every man as a brother and a friend, and pray for the blessing of heaven to rest upon all his saints. But a house divided against itself cannot stand. I am persuaded that some of those that you have looked upon as oppressive, are men of integrity, who labor diligently to build up this place, and in order so to do they have laid out their capital to give employment to as many as possible, but were they actuated only by a view to aggrandize themselves, or their own personal comfort, they would retire from public life, happy in the bosom of their own families; but their motives are above riches or self-indulgence, they know that the Lord has given a commandment for his people to gather to this place, and while they are gathering there must be employment for the poor. These men do not sleep on roses, as you might suppose, but many an anxious hour is spent in considering how they can best serve you.

I believe that no man ought to require more than a moderate time for labor, say ten hours a day, except in cases of emergency, and if any man desires me to work longer I will tell him my determination, and look out for other employment. There ought to be a certain time for labor and refreshment, and a portion for sleep, and some time that a man ought to spend in each day for reading, prayer, and instructing his family.—These, brethren are my views, and I call upon you as Englishmen, and men of God, to look well to your ways lest sudden destruction come upon you.

Brethren, in Nauvoo we are moved from the reach of the tyrant, except when lawless brigands, thirsting for blood, break through our peaceful borders and trample down law and justice under their feet. Here we have a prospect of independence through our industry and frugality, while in England the prospect was wretchedness and woe. But I do not intend to make allusions to troubles we may have escaped, but to point to present and future happiness and bliss, and therefore I subscribe myself your brother and friend.

JOHN GREENHOW.

PARABLE OF THE LAME BOY AND THE BLIND HORSE.

Now the kingdom of heaven, and the world, in the nineteenth century, is likened unto a lame boy and a blind horse: for it happened upon a certain day in the spring time of the year, that a lame boy and a blind horse chanced to meet at the forks of four roads; and the horse thus expressed himself for his lack of sight: "Oh that I had a pair of eyes to guide to the pasture where I grazed so joyfully in the summers of my youth." To which the boy replied: "I have a pair of good eyes, but my legs are not able to perform the service my body is capable of doing; and as you have no eyes that afford you sight, but have a good set of legs, I will make you this offer: If you will use your legs to carry me, I will use my eyes to guide you to the pasture you desire to enter, for I am bound to the same place, on my Father's business, to hunt for his lost sheep. So you perceive, if you grant me the use of your legs, you can have the use of my eyes, and we shall both be served at the same time." The horse readily agreed to the proposal, and the boy mounted him and went on for he knew the way!

The only annoyance they found, was that evil disposed boys, and men, that wanted to ride without asking, threw stones and clubs at them, (as they occasionally exclaimed,) "for sport;" and continually cried aloud, "Speculation! That lame boy is riding that blind horse for nothing but SPECULATION!" But the boy continued his course towards the pasture, hunting his Father's sheep, with this consolation, that after many days all will be fulfilled; and that a poor, wise child is fitter for the kingdom of heaven, than a rich, wicked King is for the judgment of God; even so: Amen.

ZAPHNATHPAANEAH.

FREE MASONS.

The Free and Accepted Ancient York Masons walked in procession on Saturday last from the Lodge Room to Main Street, where the corner stone was laid by the Worshipful Master, Mr. H. Smith, and a Masonic hymn sung by Mr. —; after which they proceeded to the grove near the Temple, when an oration was delivered by J. Taylor; and from thence they proceeded to Mr. Warner's, where about 200 set down to an excellent dinner, and the company broke up early in the afternoon, highly delighted with the day's proceedings.

The weather for the last few days has been excessively warm; the surface of the earth is considerably parched, and the crops seem to be in want of rain.

The Mississippi is falling rapidly.

The Cow Tree.—(Palo de vaca).—In passing through the valley of Aragua, Humboldt and his company stopped at the farm of Barba to satisfy themselves by ocular examination respecting the truth of the accounts they had received of the Palo de vaca, or Cow Tree, the milk of which the negroes were said to consider a wholesome aliment. They found its virtues had not been exaggerated. It is a handsome tree, resembling the broad leaved star apple. It yields an abundance of glutinous milk of an agreeable and balmy smell. This nourishing fluid flows most abundantly at the rising of the sun. The natives hasten from all quarters, with bowls to receive the milk. Humboldt declares that he never met with any object that so strongly affected his imagination as the Cow Tree.

LIVING WITHOUT SLEEP.—A recent number of the Boston Medical and Surgical Journal contains a letter from Mr. Robert F. Gourlay, giving an account of his extraordinary sleeplessness. According to Mr. G.'s own account, he was first bereft of sleep in the year 1833 for six weeks, when, about 40 years of age. Prior to that time he had never suffered for want of sleep, although at times a little sufficed for refreshment. Mr. G. was confined in London, as he alleges, by British tyranny, three years and eight months; and it was during this period he thinks, that a habit of living without sleep began to form. During his confinement he felt a very little need of sleep, and the greater part of his time in bed, which was never more than the six hours in the twenty four, was given to reveries, chiefly, he declares, "as to schemes for bettering the laboring poor of England," &c.

Soon after his liberation, having first visited Scotland, he left Edinburgh for America. He had no sleep until he reached Liverpool, where he took a warm bath before going to bed. This had the desired effect, and procured him a few hours of repose. The next morning he embarked for New York, which he reached in 42 days, without having one wink of sleep. Immediately on landing at New York he procured a warm bath, got into a comfortable bed and slept soundly. From that time forward he did not sleep for three years. He took laudanum, but that had no effect; he drank whiskey, in the hope that it would induce sleep, but it only made him sick.

In the early part of 1837, while in Ohio, he was attacked with erysipelas in the leg, and during five months was without sleep. Mr. G. had recovered, his health in some degree, when he received intelligence of the death of two of his children. He then lay two weeks in great agony, and from that time to this, a period of four years and six months, he has been entirely deprived of sleep. The last six months of his life have been spent at Boston. His health has much improved, and he entertains a hope that as soon as he is able to take exercise he will recover. On various occasions of late he has been almost asleep.

Journeyman Printers.—The Cincinnati Message pays the following deserved tribute to the worth of the members of "the craft":—"Journeyman Printers as a class are equal in intelligence to the members of any other craft or profession. Of the vast amount of general knowledge which it is their province to assist in disseminating, a goodly share is treasured up; and altho the journeyman printer is for the most part unassuming in his demeanor, the extent and variety of his information often wins the respect of those amongst whom fortune may for the time being cast his lot.

The journeyman printer is a patriot. "True, his home is in the world," and he feels little regard for provincial usages—yet he bends with pious enthusiasm at the foot of liberty's holy altar, and his heart is ever among the first to catch the sacred fire, whether kindled by the children of the sun, upon the savannas of Texas, or by those who buckle on the armor of the "buried time" in sight of Mycale and Salamis, firmly resolved "To find in Valor's tent a tomb In life or death a glorious home!" Possessed of principles so enlarged, it is natural that he should acknowledge a brotherhood of craft co-extensive with the world.—No signs or mystic ties are requisite to commend a fellow craftsman to his brotherhood, in the case of poverty or misfortune. The hand of relief is extended as to a brother, prompted by no bidding save that of sympathetic charity.

Intemperance, once so common, has been banished within a few years, and the fraternity will now compare with any other for sobriety and morality.

The History of a Day.—Every day 86,400 mortals die; some by violence, others of old age, some in battle or by shipwreck, some starved, and others murdered. In the course of one single day, how many brave ships go down at sea, and are never heard of more! How many palaces and castles, built for a thousand years, tumble into ruins, filling the air with dust; or perish by slow decay. How many births too—exceeding the number of deaths!—and marriages! and then again the churches, and mountains and trees, that vanish every day from the face of the earth! How many Kings, Princes, Nobles, Thrones, are swept away forever! How many slaves are emancipated; how many prisoners are lifted up and led forth, and set free; and how many debtors given back to their bleeding families, and all in a single day! Oppressors rebuked, as by thunder from the skies; the mighty overthrown, like Pharaoh and his host; and the lowly summoned as by the blast of the trumpet, to take their places among the rulers of the earth! What a subject for a poem.

A strange Case.—There is a little girl in Baltimore, of eleven years of age, who for the last four months has labored with fits, and who for fifty-three days, has not been able to take the slightest food or nourishment of any kind. She is said to be a living skeleton, and a physician says she is suffering from a spinal affection.

YAMKEE ENTERPRISE.—Two schooners belonging to Yarmouth, Cape Cod, came into our port yesterday, both deeply laden with anchors, chain cables, &c. which they had recovered by dragging on various bars on the Southern Coast. On Ocracoke, Wilmington, Charleston and Tybee Bars, they have succeeded in dragging up 98 anchors, some of them of the largest size. They have been out some eight months on this expedition, and are now about to return home. They inform us that they were successful in dragging up, some time since, at Sandy Hook, an anchor weighing 7000 pounds—it was supposed to belong to some frigate.

[Savannah Republican.]

Never condemn your neighbor unheard, however many the accusations which may be preferred against him of her.—Every story has two ways of being told.

Let every man mind his own business, and then every man's business will be attended to.

BY AUGUSTUS SNODGRASS.

BENOLD! how press the flying crowds Along the thorny road of Life, Seeking For Fame or Love or Power, They go—and wrap them in their shrouds— They rush into a deadly strife, And sleep in Death's funeral bower.

They dream not of the changing years, Of the flying crowds behind, But seek to ride a deathless name. In vain the toll—the strife—the tears— They go like chaff before the wind, They die like stubble in the flame.

Thus with the crowd—but there be those, Who, armed in nobleness of Good— Who wield the flaming sword of Truth, Shall rise like victors from their foes, And whose proud names o'er Death subdued, Shall flourish in eternal youth!

But why art thou a thing to dread, From which we shrink as from the grave, And bend in tears, Oblivion? Thy crysps waving o'er the dead, To holy calm our dust shall save As we forgetful slumber on!

Away with dreams of selfish pride— Away with honors' feeble shade, And love which the thoughtless lust— Can songs for all that e'er have died, Can all the honors breathed on Death, Avail the slumber of our dust?

O, gently o'er my fallen head, When comes the unavailing sleep, May thou thy wings in mercy wave, 'Tis better thus—the tranquil dead Should rest in quiet, calm and deep, And naught but Memory haunt their grave! Norwiche, N. Y.

QUILL-WHEEL KHAPSODIES.

Come, Tommy, turn the old machine, And let's have something pretty keen; I don't mean Tom Sharp, For he don't know a harp From a snowy tree: I mean the old quill-wheel On which we used to reel Threads of poetry, That's right—God save Israel and Jewry—Damn Begg with the rest of Missouri; Bless the Mormons with sense, Jolly hearts and pence, For all common use, To laugh at old Van Buren, And frustrate each Missourian, And give 'em the deuce— And while they pretend to be hunting old Joe, We'll rise up and just let 'em know, (That poor simple Sim, And the rest of his skim, What to push with the horn,) Are really Samson's foxes, Or Pandora's boxes, And will burn up the corn Among the Philistines, as chaff; While Mormons, like Sampson, will laugh, All in a smile, "Oh Hick a feller!"

IRELAND.

The repeal movement in Ireland cannot be viewed with indifference by the people of the United States. They are approaching a crisis, and if we are not much mistaken, that crisis will insure the liberty of Ireland, and immediately thereafter the whole of Europe. Nothing short of Universal Liberty will satisfy the next century. The march of the mind is onward. In the most depressed portion of Europe, where Kings and Lords bear sway, faint gleams of light are seen, and enslaved man occasionally feels that he is a man as much as his pretended superior. He feels that the earth is his mother, and that the aristocrat has no better. He feels that he breathes the free air of heaven, that his existence is his own given him by the Ruler of the universe.

At this very moment England feels that her Throne is endangered. She looks abroad upon the poor oppressed, and justice in mercy pleads for her subjects. Long have their calls been disregarded, and now when the wounds inflicted begin to be insupportable, and the people of Ireland are lashed into rebellion, England, the usurper of rights, threatens force! If there is an Irishman on the face of the globe that would look coldly on and see Ireland crushed again, we have mistaken their character most widely. The first blow that England strikes to quell the spirit of Repeal, will be the signal for universal sympathy, and may God grant it universal aid—the result of which is Universal Liberty.

SILK.

The Louisville Journal of the 25th inst. says: "Dr. Charles Stuart, of Breckenridge county, Kentucky, exhibited to us yesterday 500 skeins of sewing silk, manufactured in his family. It is of various colors, and is pronounced in all respects a superior article. The dyeing was done by his wife, and the colors are bright and fast."

Whenever a patriotic and enterprising gentleman establishes a cocoonery, the neighbors flock in to see the operation of breeding and feeding the worms, and of reeling and spinning the silk; and they are surprised to find the whole matter is as simple as certain, and as much within the means of the humblest farmer, as the production of a patch of flax, threshing out the seed, and breaking, hatching, and spinning the flax. Many, when they see all this with their own eyes, immediately commence the business, especially the poor and those who have families and children that can make nothing at anything else. It is the opinion of Dr. Stuart that the culture of silk is now permanently established as one branch of National domestic industry, and that it will be, in a short time, as common as the culture of flax now in the West. There are few farmers of the poor class that could not, without interference with their farming operations or their present domestic economy, produce from forty to a hundred dollars worth of silk a year—an amount which would be so much clear gain."

The children of the sloping isle of Rattray, Scotland, when they first begin to toddle about, are tethered to a stake to prevent them rolling off into the sea!

President of the Court.

The above fines have been handed to me by the secretary of the Legion for collection, by order of the Major General; and I hereby notify all concerned, to call upon me at my residence, at the corner of Main and Knight streets, forthwith, and make settlement, as I do not purpose calling upon delinquents any oftener than once. I would, therefore, give all concerned this friendly notice, that if they wish to save costs, they had better attend to it immediately.

I would further notice that it is useless for delinquents to apply to me to remit their fines, as I am not empowered so to do. A written notice of the remittal of their fines from their respective Colonies, will be satisfactory; otherwise I shall have to proceed.

The delinquents' list is not all published; all therefore, who know themselves to be such, had better call upon me forthwith.

POETRY.

THE WIFE OF THE INFAMOUS.

A lovely thing is the light that j y
O'er the young and gentle brow,
When the bounding heart lives in its rest,
As the humming-bird, as the rose:
But the grace of grief, o'er beauty thrown,
Is a velvet shroud, I ween:
'Tis the bloom of light of a moonly night,
When it o'erspreads a summer sea.

I am thinking of her whom I saw last night,
Of her dark and gentle eye,
Which melted to angelic thoughts,
And shone like a star in the sky:
Her voice—'twas the voice that we hear in dreams,
Or the sweet tones of May—Eye, voice and all, are with me now,
And I can pass away!

He—once her young heart's joy—died near,
And he is a hum by her side:
What was it wrong her gentle eye
Went from him to the dead?
His soul—'twas the soul of a saint,
His breath is a breath of flame:
And glowing heavily, there he sat,
And rocked in his dotage.

And this, all this, were the world looked on,
Amid a strife of wrong:
Oh, I felt it would be a joy to die
For that gentle, loving wrong:
With a quivering lip, and a low moaning eye,
And her mate in crushed despair—
She looked as if from heaven she looked,
If grief entered there.

How beautiful, how sorrow-crowned:
Thy face, no face, but for me!
As fair, as pale, as the sunlit wreck,
When to the tide thou didst flee:
Earth, etc., and a beautiful
But earth, how a y, no sea,
With aught but a sweet, bright,
Deserted one, as I see.

And thou, the lot! who hast thrown away
A gift earth could not buy—
Proud joys are thou—art cheaply bought,
But grief, do thou, do thou die!
An angel, thy face, thy voice,
Drink, drink and die, thy deathly form
May blot God's earth no more!

Woman! What gloom on thy sinless path
Men's selfish voices ring!
Has ever the man's joy of guilt!
But thine, as the sting:
How man's gentle heart is crushed;
How many a form and low!
O! the angels pause in their hymns of bliss,
To weep o'er woman's woe.

From the Portland Advertiser.

WRECK OF THE BRIG TURNER OF PORTLAND.

Blanchard, who was in command of this ill-fated vessel at the time she was wrecked, has furnished us with the following account of the disaster, and the subsequent sufferings of himself and crew during a period of forty-six days:—

The brig Turner sailed from Portland, on the 20th of January, 1843, bound for Maderia, with the following persons on board, viz:—Captain, Beza Blanchard, Jr. of Cumberland; mate, Samuel Marshall, Portland; seamen, Thomas Morrison, Portland; Joseph Malore, New Orleans; Thomas Matthews, Boston; John Hall, Long Island, N. Y. and Thomas McGran, Portland; cook, William Morris, [colored,] of Portland.

We experienced heavy weather, with continued gales of wind for the first seventeen days, which caused the cargo and deck-load to settle to leeward, so as to give the vessel a list to port; but she being strong and tight, and with an excellent sea-boat, this gave us no apprehensions for our safety.

Harmony and good order prevailed among the crew—every man did his duty with alacrity, and we made out to weather all dangers till the 16th of February. On that day at four o'clock, A. M. while scudding under close reefed sails, steering a S. E. by E. course dead before the wind—in lat. 34 45, lon 30, a tremendous sea broke over the stern, swept the man from the helm, and hove the brig on her beam ends. The foremast and bowsprit snapped off as though they had been reed, and the deck-load was immediately swept away. As soon as possible we cut the lanyards of the main rigging with our knives, when the mainmast went by the board, and the vessel righted, full of water, with nothing on deck but a few thousand of lumber and one empty water cask. The shock had been so violent as to break the main hatch bar, and tear up the hatch, and sweep off binacle, companion-way and booby hatch. The rail, stanchions and starboard channels went with the foremast and fore-rigging. The deck-load went with such force as to fly completely over the head of a man who stood at the pith, without injuring him. The mate, who was on the lee side of the quarter deck at the moment, was washed overboard, but succeeded in recovering the wreck, and by assistance got up to the windward.

The vessel lay on her side about fifteen minutes: and no sooner had she righted than all hands commenced clearing the wreck, and saving what provisions could be come at. It was impossible to enter the cabin, as the floor had been broken up, and every thing was rushing from side to side, and in the midst of the confusion, the water casks in the run having got afloat were stove, so that we were left without a drop of fresh water. We were more fortunate in regard to provisions, having succeeded in securing a barrel of bread—which however was nearly all wet with salt water—four or five pieces of salt pork, and subsequently about two thirds of a barrel of beef.

At about 6 o'clock, A. M. the wreck wore around and brought the larboard side to the wind, which exposed us more to the sea, set the lumber on deck washing from side to side, and rendered our condition yet more dangerous and uncomfortable. She lay with the wind about two points abaft the beam.

The waves broke over the quarter deck and against the stern continually, and with great violence, and in a short time the rudder was carried away, taking with it a part of the transom. The fore part of the deck was the safest place for us; thither we resorted, and in some sort to better our condition, we went to work and lashed some boards from the stump of the foremast to the night head and palbit, which in a measure broke the force of the sea.

Our only hope was that some vessel would come to our relief, for to all human appearances we could not survive a week, in our present condition, destitute of water as we were, scantily supplied with provisions, and continually exposed to the vicissitudes of the weather, and the seas pray.

On the third day the gale abated, and in some respects our condition became more comfortable, but by this time we began to suffer the torments of a burning thirst. Our allowance of food was a biscuit and about three ounces of pork per day, but this was as much as we could eat without water. For eight days we remained in this condition, having no water, excepting a little which some of us caught during a momentary shower—barely sufficient to moisten our lips. Some did not even obtain this satisfaction.—We were fortunate enough, however, to find several potatoes in the cabin, which were divided among all hands—in several instances a single raw potatoe being cut up among eight of us. But small as was the quantity allotted to each, the moisture helped to sustain us.—We also found some relief in chewing lead. In the meantime, some of the crew drank considerable quantity of salt water, which caused dizziness and slight derangement.

In the course of twenty-five days all the bread which remained turned yellow and was extremely sour and bitter; having been wet, it heated spontaneously and became dry and hard.

On the 24th the weather had become settled, and we had a fine shower of rain, during which we caught about eight gallons of water, besides getting a good drink all round. As soon as the rain began to fall every man flew to the quarter deck, and began supping up the water; then all proceeded to catch what they could in boots, shoes, hats &c. It is impossible to describe our feelings of gratitude for this timely relief. The afternoon before, while gathered together on the quarter deck, some of us were speaking of the impossibility of our surviving much longer unless the Lord interposed to save us, when one of the men fell upon his knees and began to pray. We all followed his example, and prayed for rain. When it came, we felt that it was a direct interposition of Divine Providence, and many were the expressions of thankfulness that burst from the lips of every individual, while engaged in collecting the water—such as "the Lord is good!" "thank God for this," &c. We felt encouraged—hope sprang again in our bosoms—we felt that we were in the keeping of Him, who is able to save in the time of need.

On the 25th we had another shower, and obtained water enough to last us 17 days, allowing a pint for a day to each man. On the same day also we caught a shark, from which we got more than a gallon of blood, which we poured into two boots; and allowanced out in a horn, made to keep sail needles in.—When the shark was cut open, some of the men thrust their heads into the bowels, and sucked up the blood and water that was flowing out. We cut the shark into strips, and hung them up to dry, but most of it was spoiled by being wet with salt water, so that it we attempted to eat it, it created intolerable thirst.

Such of our sail needles as would bend we made into hooks, and succeeded in catching several small fish, weighing from two to four pounds each, which were excellent eating. As an inducement for the men to employ themselves in fishing, the blood and the eyes of all that each man caught were given to him extra. In a short time, however, we lost our hooks, catching them in the side of the vessel, parting the lines, &c.; we then drew the staples out of the combings of the hatches, and made rough hooks, which we fastened to the ends of strips of board, and found them to work well—but these could only be used in calm weather.

About the 1st of March the wind shifted to the south, which brought the starboard side of our vessel to the windward. The rail on the side had been swept away, so that we were now more exposed to the sea than before, and it was imperatively necessary that we should find some means of protecting our selves against the danger of being washed overboard. For this purpose we wrenched the carlings from the cabin floor, lashed them together, and covered them with boards and an old spare topsail. Being much weakened by long exposure, it was found necessary to use three or four days water, to enable us to bear the fatigue consequent upon accomplishing this.

Our imaginations were constantly upon the stretch to discover something to quench our raging thirst. Every spring of water we had ever known was dwelt upon with inconceivable longing, and even the dirty slops we had seen running from sink spouts were the theme of frequent and impassioned conversation. Some of the men talked seriously of cutting open their veins and sucking their own blood; they would no doubt have done so had they been able to persuade themselves that this would have quenched the fire within.

For several days after this we had calm weather, and during the night heavy dews fell, by which the men obtained some relief. No sooner did the day begin to dawn than every man was seen lapping the moisture with his tongue from the rails. We also found considerable relief in bathing, and keeping our flannels wet with salt water. Still our condition was almost hopeless; our water was fast decreasing, our strength failing; and death from thirst and hunger seemed to stare us in the face. We had likewise a premonition of approaching dissolution in our aching eye balls and falling sight.

The days dragged heavily away without bringing any alteration in our condition, except for the worse. Some of the men again began to drink salt water, and when urged to consider its evil consequences, they would reply, "we may as well die one way as another." Urine was also drunk more or less, but it had no power to quench thirst.

But a second time Providence interposed to sustain us. On the 13th of March, in the forenoon, a barrel was discovered in the larboard side of the cabin, beneath the water. One of the men—Joseph Malore, of New Orleans—who was an excellent swimmer, went down and succeeded in bringing it to the surface, when we made fast a rope round it, and by uniting all our strength, at length got it upon deck. To our inexpressible joy it proved to be filled with molasses. The bung was knocked out, every man took a hearty draught, and found great alleviation from his sufferings.

In the evening of this day we drank the last drop of our water, and were thus destitute a second time, many hundred miles from land. Had it not been for our store of molasses, which we hoped would lengthen out our existence a little longer, we should have given up in despair. We tried salt water and molasses, and urine and molasses, but it only gave a temporary respite to our intolerable cravings for drink. But the Lord was mindful of us.

On the next day, the 14th of March, the wind blew strong from the South, and the sea broke over the quarter deck continually; but toward 3 o'clock P. M., during a heavy rain squall, it veered to the Westward, which brought the ship's head to the sea, leaving the quarter deck less exposed—thus we had another opportunity of catching water. It continued to pour down copiously for several hours, and we obtained about thirty gallons.

It is impossible to describe the effect of protracted thirst on individuals, to those who have not felt it. During the rain some of the men were so completely blind to their future interest, as to spend their whole time in quenching present thirst; they had said that if they could only get one good draught of water, they would willingly die—and that one draught they seemed determined to have. They would drink till they vomited—then turn to again and sup up the water until they were unable to do any thing but lie down, and beg for more drink.—Those who denied themselves and drank but little at a time, held out the longest. One after another gave out, till but two were left to catch water. The effects of drinking too much operated like physic, and for the time increased the inward thirst and fever.

We were now able to double our allowance of water—but soon had to reduce it again to one pint an hour to each man per day. On the 21st of March we caught about fifteen gallons more of water.

Our condition, so far as food and water were concerned, was now much better than it had been, but we were destined to new afflictions. In consequence of sleeping on the hard boards, our flesh became tender, much chafed—and owing to living on salt provisions—and being constantly wet with salt water, we broke out with boils and sores, which were almost insupportably painful.

About this time, Joseph Malore dove again into the cabin in hopes of finding some of the pork which had been kept there. He discovered, and subsequently with our assistance, got up four barrels of beef, but could find none of the pork. Malore was the only man on board who could dive, and through his intrepidity, under Providence, we were saved from dying of hunger.

From the 21st of March till the 1st of April, it blew an almost incessant gale of wind. At the time this gale commenced, we were lying with our starboard side, from which the rail was gone, to the wind; and as the leeward rail still remained unbroken, the sea, which rolled in violently, had no chance to run off. Our water was in great danger of being swept away, and we expected every moment to see our barricade torn to pieces.

In this situation, when despair was depicted on every countenance, we committed our case to Him who controls the wind and waves, and signally were our prayers answered; for but a short time had elapsed when the vessel wore round so as to present her unbroken side to the gale, and in this position we lay comparatively secure.

During the time we were on the wreck, five vessels passed in sight—two of them within three or four miles of us. Only those who have been similarly situated can imagine our feelings at seeing succor approach thus almost within our reach and we not able to secure it.

We had now been so long on the wreck, with the wind blowing most of the time from the Westward, that we began to have hopes of reaching the coast of Barbary. We would gladly have trusted ourselves to the keeping of the Moors and Arabs; but a better fate awaited us. On the 3d of April, at about two o'clock, p. m. a man on the lookout gave the cry of "Sail O!" We had been so often disappointed that at first this caused very little excitement, but as she hove up from the horizon, we discovered her to be a brig standing directly towards us. On she came, keeping both masts in range, till within half a mile of us, when it became apparent that she had discovered our shattered wreck—a boat was lowered over her side, and commenced pulling towards us. On seeing this, our crew, who had with difficulty been kept from the water during the brig's approach, flew to the cask, and drank to satiety.

In a few minutes the boat arrived alongside—we got into her without confusion, as it had previously been arranged in what order we should go over the side—and ere long we were on board the French brig La Furet, Capt. Augustus Canlin. It was 4 o'clock in the afternoon when we were taken off the wreck; since the disaster, accordingly, we had been 46 days and 12 hours confined to her, and all that time had lived on raw food. This took place in lat. 35 48, lon. 14 40 thus it will be seen we had drifted more than 700 miles to the eastward.

The captain, officers and crew of La Furet treated us kindly, supplied us with clothing and every thing else that their circumstances would permit, but we suffered much for the want of medical aid and proper food.

We arrived at Gibraltar on the 13th, but the brig was quarantined, and we were debarred from going on shore. Here we remained till the brig Caroline, of Boston, Capt. Hill, was ready for sea, when we were taken on board of her, and sailed for Boston, at which place we arrived on the 21st of May, having been one hundred and eleven days from Portland.—We must make our grateful acknowledgements for the kind manner in which we were treated by the captain, mate and crew of the Caroline. Heaven prosper them.

"A pint of water per day, to landmen, may seem considerable; but sailors are in the habit of drinking a great deal at sea—and when it is recollect that at Capt. Blanchard and his crew, and a boat altogether on salt provisions, it will be so that such a supply would be altogether in a degree to quench their thirst.—Editor Advocate.

INSIGNIFICANCE OF THIS WORLD.

Though the earth were to be burned up, though the trumpet of its dissolution were sounded, though you sky were to pass away as a scroll, and every visible glory which the finger of the Divinity has inscribed on it were extinguished forever—an event so awful to us, and to every world in our vicinity, by which so many souls would be extinguished, and so many varied scenes of life and population would rush into forgetfulness—what is it in the high scale of the Almighty's workmanship? A mere shred, which though scattered into nothing, would leave the universe of God one entire scene of greatness and majesty. Though the earth and the heavens were to disappear, there are other worlds which roll afar; the light of other suns shine upon them; and the sky which mantles them, is garnished with other stars. Is it presumption to say, that the moral world extends to these distant and unknown regions? that they are occupied with peoples that the charities of home and of neighborhood flourish there? that the praises of God are there lifted up, and his goodness rejoiced in? and the richness of the Divine attributes is there felt and admired by intelligent worshippers?

And what is this world in the immensity which seems with them; and what are they who occupy it? The universe at large would suffer as little in its splendor and variety by the destruction of our planet, as the verdure and sublime magnificence of a forest would suffer by the fall of a single leaf. The leaf quivers on the branch which supports it. It lies at the mercy of the slightest accident. A breath of wind tears it from its stem, and it lights on the stream of water which passes underneath. In a moment of time the life, which we know by the microscope it seems with is extinguished, and an occurrence so insignificant in the eye of man, and in the scale of his observation, carries in it, to the myriads which people this little leaf, an event as decisive as the destruction of a world.

Now, on the grand scale of the universe, we, the occupants of this ball, which performs its little round among the suns and the systems which astronomy has unveiled—we may feel the same insecurity. We differ from the leaf only in this circumstance, that it would require the operation of greater elements to destroy us. But these elements exist—the fire which rages within, may lift its devouring energy to the surface of our planet, and transform it into one wide and wasting volcano. The sudden formation of elastic matter in the bowels of the earth—and it lies within the agency of known substances to accomplish this—may explode it into fragments. The exhalation of noxious air from below, may impart a virulence to the air that is around us; it may affect the delicate portion of its ingredients; and the whole of animated nature may wither and die under the malignity of a tainted atmosphere. A blinding comet may cross this planet in its orbit, and realize all the terrors which superstition has conceived of it. We cannot anticipate with pie-cision the consequences of an event which every astronomer must know to lie within the limits of chance and probability. It may hurry our globe towards the sun—or drag it to the outer regions of the planetary system—or give it a new axis of revolution—and the effect which I shall simply announce, with explaining it, would be to change the plates of the ocean, and bring another mighty flood upon our island and continents.

These are accidents which may happen in a single instant of time, and against which nothing known in the present system of things provides us with any security. They might not annihilate the earth, but they would unpeopled it; and we, who tread its surface with such firm and assured footsteps, are at the mercy of devouring elements, which let loose upon us by the head of the Almighty, would spread solitude, and death over the dominions of the world.

Now, it is this littleness, and this insecurity, which makes the protection of the Almighty so dear to us, and bring with such emphasis to every pious bosom the holy lessons of humility and gratitude. The God who sitteth above and presides in high authority over all worlds, is mindful of man; and thought at this moment his agency is felt in the same security in his providence, as if we were the objects of his undivided care.

It is not for us to bring our minds up to this mysterious agency. But such is the incomprehensible fact, that the same Being, whose eye is abroad over the whole universe, gives vegetation to every blade of grass, and motion to every particle of blood which circulates through the veins of the minutest animal: that though his mind takes into its comprehensive grasp immensity and all its wonders, I am as much known to him as if I were the object of his attention; that he marks all my thoughts; that he gives birth to every feeling and every movement within me; and that, with an exercise of power which I can neither describe nor comprehend, the same God who sits on the highest heaven, and reigns over the glories of the firmament, is at my right hand, to give me every breath which I draw, and every comfort which I enjoy.—Chalmers.

IRISHMEN IN AMERICA.

One beautiful trait in the Irish character, is that after the poor emigrants have been here a few months, their first exertions are made to send home a small offering to a father, mother, sister, or brother, as the case may be. One instance of filial affection especially pleased me.

One morning, a young Irishman, from the county of Limerick, presented me with a letter of introduction. He was a laboring man, twenty-one years of age. I asked him how long he had been in this country.

"Six weeks, sir," replied he, "I landed at Boston, and found work there, and so I stopped; but as I had this letter to your honor, I was uneasy until I delivered it."

I inquired then if he had saved any money.

"Oh, thin, yes sir, praised be God, I have a trifle, and sure by reason of that I've come to as your honor to send it home to my poor old mother, that wants it."

"How much do you wish to send?" said I.

"Twenty five dollars, sir, is all that I can spare at this present time; and sure, I wish it was more!"

"Twenty five dollars!" repeated I, "why you are doing wonders! This is a great deal to save in so short a time; and I fear you are leaving yourself too bare. Hadn't you better send fifteen now and the rest by and by? You may be sick. Tell me how much money you will have left, if you send the twenty-five dollars."

At first he would not tell me; but I insisted and he replied: "Well, thin sir, I'll have just three dollars and a half, which is plenty for me; for sure I've good health and a strong pair of arms; and, with the blessing of God, I'll soon earn it over again. And thin sir, only consider the poor old widow at home, that depends on me; and didn't I promise to send her my very first wages, and won't she expect it, and didn't God prosper me for that purpose?"

"Say no more," said I; "you are a good lad; and the twenty-five dollars shall be forwarded without delay."

Just as I had fixed this matter for him, a gentleman from Massachusetts entered the office, introduced himself, and said:

"I have been told by my friend, Mr. G.—that you often have some good Irish laborers recommended to you by your friends abroad; and so I thought I would call upon you, as I want a farmer just now."

I simply related to him the scene that had just taken place between Michael L.—and myself; and as soon as I had finished, he exclaimed:

The Markets.—The Baltimore American of the 31st ult. says: Our report of the market in another column, shows that breadstuffs have taken a further move upwards. Yesterday some thousands of bushels of Pennsylvania, wheat received by the Tide Water Canal, were sold at $1.05 and $1.10 per bushel. Flour, it will be seen has also advanced in price. Corn 53 cts. A like rise has taken place at Philadelphia and New York.

Heavy Verdict.—At Pittsburgh, on Wednesday afternoon last, in the United States Circuit Court, Judge Baldwin presiding, the jury rendered a verdict of $80,770.04 against David Lynch, late Postmaster of that city, and in favor of the United States. The claim consisted of various sums of money received by defendant from other Postmasters and other persons under instructions from Amos Kendall, Postmaster General.

The London Times.—This extraordinary Journal, which possesses a more extensive establishment than any other in the world created no little stir in political circles some years since, by a sudden change of politics. On one day it was whig, on the next day Tory. The price paid for the transportation of this powerful engine was 108,000.

The advertisements in the Times for a single day frequently exceed 1000, and every one is paid before inserted. Unlike the papers of this continent, it has no subscribers; it supplies the News Agents, and they the public. There are two powerful steam engines on the premises, and the impression is made by a double cylinder press. Its circulation is the largest in the world; there is not a town on the civilized earth, in which the Times may not be found. Its reporters are to be met with in all quarters of the globe, accompanying the expedition to China, and participating in the toils and dangers of the Indian campaigns. It has correspondents in every land. Its expenses have traversed the desert, and anticipated the Indian Mails. Its agents are in every court, and it lays bare their most secret proceedings. Mr. John Walter, the late member of Nottingham, is the principal proprietor, and he draws from it a yearly revenue of $80,000. It had formerly three regular editors, Messrs. Barnes, Lawson, and Delano, besides a large corps of occasional writers. Since the death of Mr. Barnes, this number has been increased.

The History of a day.—Every day 86,400 mortals die, some by violence, others of old age—some in battle or by shipwreck—some starved, and others murdered. In the course of one single day, how many brave ships go down at sea, and are never heard of more! How many palaces and castles, built for a thousand years, tumble into ruins, filling the air with dust; or perish by slow decay. How many births too—exceeding the number of deaths! and married and then again the churches, and mountains and trees, that vanish every day from the face of the earth! How many Kings—Princes—Nobles—Thrones—are swept away forever! How many slaves are emancipated; how many prisoners are lifted up and led forth, and set free; and how many delvers given back to their bleeding families—and all in a single day! Oppressors rebuked, as by thunders from the skies; the mighty overthrown, like Pharaoh and his host; and the lowly summoned, as by the blast of a trumpet, to take their places among the rulers of the earth! What a subject for a poem—Singular Phenomenon.—(One of those wonders of nature so rarely witnessed was yesterday seen by several in this city whose station and respectability, place their testimony beyond dispute. One of the gentlemen was fortunate enough to have seen what we are about to narrate, is our informant. The fog which yesterday overhung the city, spread in dense volumes over the valley which lies between the heights towards the north west. Early in the afternoon, a lady residing in St. Louis street, had her attention drawn by one of her children, who was gazing from the window, to the resemblance of a ship in the air. The appearance presented was that of a vessel, abrig, beating to windward, with all sails set, and apparently floating on the surface of the mist. So distinctly visible was it that the spectators (for it was seen at the same time by several others) could trace the shrouds and the smallest of the rigging; the mainsail appeared to be clewed up in three places. What rendered the sight still more beautiful was the presence of a shadow of the vessel, as in the water, the outline, masts &c. being reversed, as when thrown from a vessel actually moving through the water. This phenomenon was again seen towards the evening, but less distinctly visible. It appeared in the fog over the valley below Charlesburg.—Quebec Mercury.

What an extraordinary curve your horse has in the spine," said a gentleman to an Irish farmer; "can you account for it?" "By the powers, sir, and to be sure I am able. I have heard, sir, that before the buste was my property, he was backed against another horse, your honor, who bade him hollow—and I dare say it's the reason that his back never got straight again."

Bad News for the Tailors.—Some of the British manufacturers are endeavoring to bring out coats and trousers woven in the frame, and it is said they are quite sanguine of ultimately accomplishing their purpose.—They will, perhaps, next attempt to manufacture persons to wear them, which may be necessary in order to get their wares to "fit."

This is the last charge you'll bring against me," as the soldier remarked when they were shooting him for desertion.

"Och! it's a fine thing to be a gentleman!" said Andy. "If a gentleman breaks a horse's neck, he's only a bowld rider, while a poor servant is a careless black-guard for only taking a sweat out of him. If a gentleman drinks till he can't see a hole in a ladder, he's only 'fresh,' but 'drunk' is the word for a poor man. And if a gentleman kicks up a row, he's a five spirited fellow, while a poor man is a disorderly vagabond, for the same;" and the Justice, axes him to dinner, and sends the other to jail. Oh, faix, the law is a dainty lady, she takes people by the hand who can afford to wear gloves, but people with brown fists must keep their distance."

Melancholy Accident.—On Monday the 5th inst., a most unfortunate accident occurred in Donegal township, Westmoreland county. The particulars of which are as follows:—George and Henry, sons of Mr. Geo. Marker, were engaged in making fence, and while George the elder brother, was splitting out a ground chuck, the axe slipped from his hands and struck Henry in one limb, cutting off the artery leading from the body through the limb, causing death in less than an hour. The deceased was aged about 11 years.

A Man killed by the kick of a Horse.—On Saturday morning last, Mr. Michael, son of Philip Klingensmith, of Allegheny township, Westmoreland county, was kicked by a horse in the stomach, at the Buffalo Furnace about 12 miles above Freeport, and died on the evening of the same day. Mr. K. left a wife and two small children together with a numerous body of relatives to mourn his melancholy casualty.

Sentimental.—"What are you muttering there about?" asked a tender father of a son he had just spoken harshly to. "Oh, let him alone," said the mother. His eyes are full of the heart's rain, (poetic woman) and his soul is clouded with grief."

"It is, eh?" queried the husband, "his muttering there is a sort of mental thunder, I suppose."

"Yes," sobbed the wife. "Well," was the reply, "we must expect electricity, so I'll apply a lightning rod."

Thus saying, he took a trim piece of pipe and whaled him in warm style. The value of Advertising.—The Cincinnati Gazette says: We were forcibly reminded on Saturday of the direct benefits of advertising. An old subscriber to the Gazette, who lives in the Green River Co. Ky., called in on that day to pay his subscription. Amongst his memorandums, he had one with a half a dozen advertisements, Oil, Garden Seeds, Fruit trees, Hardware, &c., of which he and his neighbors were in want. He expended upwards of $1000 in cash amongst the advertisers, before he left the city. So much for advertising.

Astonishing Audacity! A writer in the National Intelligencer intimates that the absolute power of its nobility, and the slavery of the great mass of its laborers, was the true reason of the fall of Poland! By the way did it never occur to any of our readers that Poland was a slaveholding nation? That the "partition of Poland" gave civil rights, liberty and protection to the masses of its inhabitants, and brought its haughty and oppressive nobles to submission to equal laws? This is the fact. Poland fell because her people were slaves!

Jean Jacques tells us that when his wife died every farmer in the neighborhood offered to console him by one of their daughters! but that a few weeks afterward, his own having shared the same fate, no one ever thought of replacing his loss by the offer of another; hereby proving the different value people set upon their cows and children.

The Widow's Mite. A lady in genteel, but very moderate circumstances, when presenting the clergyman of—, with a small sum for a charitable object, said, "You may put it down as the Widow's Mite, sir." Not so, my friend, replied the worthy pastor. "I beg you may," the lady earnestly added, "it is but a trifle." "I am aware of that madam, but it is not all your living." How very few have, in truth, presented the widow's mite, although many apply the passage to themselves.

There is now living, near Georgetown Heights, D.C., a lady aged near 100, who is the only person in the District, we believe, says the "Capital," that can and has said, "Arise, daughter—go see your daughter, for your daughter's daughter has a daughter."

O'Connell at Home. The following sketch, from the pen of a Tory, is from a late number of Ainsworth's Magazine. "I had, in the morning, seen Mr. O'Connell's bright-faced grand-daughter, as she came from the chapel to the house where I was staying. His daughter, the Lady Mayoress, had also called—a fair, intelligent creature; and, though the mother of a large family, a still young and lovely woman. I had heard her express the most charitable opinion with evident ingenuity, and could not but admire the domestic happiness to which the Agitator was wont to retire from the turmoils of public life. Let his choice of that life proceed from patriotic, ambitious, or selfish motives, or what it may, the position I found Mr. O'Connell held among his intimate friends and connexions surprised me. In the circle, all looked up to him as an idol of admiration and regard, I heard no political discussions; I listened only to anecdotes of his merry humor among his 'peeps' at Darrynane, and his grand children at the mansion house; and, having seen quite enough of the world (heaven help me) to have rubbed off the rust of narrow minded prejudice, I felt 'how little indeed do we know of one another's inner!'"—how hard is it to judge of a man's private character! and above all, what a pleasant thing it is for one (brought up, too, in directly opposite principles) to discover redeeming, nay, endearing qualities, in one whom we have been led to consider altogether too worldly for the enjoyment of domestic affections."

Murder of Santa Fe Traders.—About the first of April last, a band of fifteen men, citizens of Missouri, left Independence with the avowed object of joining a man named Warfield, said to be a Colonel in the Texian army. On their route, and near the Arkansas river, they met a Spaniard named Antonio Charvis, with five of his servants. They robbed him of $32,000 in gold and silver, and some furs, after which they shot him. The party then drove the servants back in the direction from which they came, and, loaded with their booty, made their way towards Independence, where, we are happy to say, most of them have been arrested.—Burlington Iowa Gazette.

Whys and Whens.—Why is a pig in a parlor like a house on fire? Because the sooner it's put out the better. When is a lady like a trout? When she takes a fly that brings her to the bank.

Why is the ass like a good loaf? Because it's light when it rises.

Why is a bird like a greedy creature? Because it never eats less than a peck.

Why is the temperance medal like an umbrella? Because it keeps you dry.

When is a fowl's neck like a bell? When it's rung for dinner.

Why is a boy like a pretty bonnet? Because one becomes a woman the other do n't.

Why is killing bees like a confession? Because you unbuzz'em. [Punch.]

A Sad Spectacle. On our way from Philadelphia to this city on Friday last, upon our return from Baltimore, our attention was arrested by the appearance of a fellow-passenger, who chanced to sit near us in the cars. He was apparently not over 30, dressed in coarse and seedy garments, and evidently in the last stage of consumption. Upon his face was stamped the seat of death more clearly and terribly than we had ever seen it upon any other living countenance. He was yoked to a skeleton, and the livid paleness of a corpse had driven from his face every hue of health and life. His eyes were restless, and glared with dull but eager stare upon what was passing around him. We did not hear him speak till we had reached Jersey City, and then upon the ferry-boat, we observed him talking to a number of gentlemen, who were standing around him. He spoke feebly but with great earnestness and excitement. He said he had just been released from the Penitentiary in Pennsylvania, where he had been a long time confined. He had never before confessed his shame, but now, he said, he could not help it. He had been a great villain in his life, but, said he, as his eyes swam in tears, add his thin, blue lips quivered with emotion, that's all past, and I have got to die in a day or two.

His mother lived at No.—Greenwich street; he had not seen her for many years, and the only favor he asked of God or man was, that he might reach her home and die in her arms. He seemed in perfect agony of apprehension lest the police officers of the city should see him as he landed, and detain him till he should be too late to see his mother. They all knew him, he said to be a great rogue, and if somebody did not aid him, he knew he would die in the City Prison instead of his mother's house. He seemed greatly relieved and truly thankful when several gentlemen offered to send him at once to her residence. We know not what became of him but think it scarcely possible that he should be living now. But who can picture either the joy or the agony of that last meeting between the widowed mother and her wretched son, coming from the dungeon to be laid somewhat more gently in the grave! The excitement of the hope of meeting her seemed to be all that kept him alive; and it appeared scarcely possible that his feeble frame could survive the excitement of the meeting itself.—N. Y. Tribune.

NAUVOO SELECT SCHOOL.

MR. J. A. BANISTER, recently from New York, proposes opening a school, on Monday the 9th day of July, 1843, on the corner of Broadway and Parley streets, to be denominated the Nauvoe Select School, designed for the instruction of Youth in the following branches, viz. Reading, Writing, Spelling, Orthography, Geography, Arithmetic, Grammar, Composition, Oratory, and Philosophy. From his experience in teaching, Mr. B. feels confident that he can give general satisfaction to both scholars and parents.

The youth that to virtue add honor would rise, His time, books and talents most highly must prize. It is therefore necessary that the first principle and rudiments of the English language should be, not only early but thoroughly inscribed in the mind of the young. Mr. B.'s plan, therefore is, to suffer a scholar to proceed no farther in any branch of education than what he learns to perfection; so that what he does know, he knows sure. Try it and see. Terms per quarter, For Reading, Writing and Arithmetic, $2.00. For Grammar, Composition, Oratory and Philosophy, with the lower branches, $2.50. Each quarter to consist of 12 weeks. Nauvoe July 5th, 1843.

A LIST OF LETTERS REMAINING in the Post Office at Nauvoe, Illinois, July 1st, 1843, which, if not called for before October 1st, will be sent to the Post Office Department as dead letters.

Life and Death of the Sexes.—The laws of life and mortality between the sexes are very remarkable. They are stated thus:

1. In the present condition of the white population of the United States, the number of females born per annum is about 12,000 less than the males. This determines of itself that polygamy is not a natural condition of man, and the laws of our religion and nature are the same—that one man shall be the husband of one woman.

2. At 20 years of age, the females exceed the males. This proves that between birth and 20 the mortality among boys has been much greater than among the girls.

3. From 20 to 40 the men again exceed the women, which shows that this is the period of greatest mortality among women.

4. From 40 to 70 the difference rapidly diminishes, the females, as in the early part of life, gaining on the males. This shows that this is the period of greatest danger and exposure to men the least to women.

5. From 70 onward the women outnumber the men; this shows conclusively that relatively speaking, in comparison with men, the healthiest period of female life is at the close of it. Absolutely however, no period to either sex is as healthy as that of youth; the blooming period of boyhood and girlhood.

The above deductions of statistics tables correspond with every day observations of human life.

Women are exposed to peculiar hazards in the middle of life; out in the long run for the largest part of this exposure, danger, and risk, in the civilized nations, fall on men in the active periods of life.

WILSON LAW, President of the Court.

The above fines have been handed to me by the secretary of the Legion for collection, by order of the Major General; and I hereby certify all concerned, to call upon me at my residence, at the corner of Main and Knight streets, forthwith, and make settlement, as I do not purpose calling upon delinquents any oftener than once. I would, therefore, give all concerned this friendly notice, that if they wish to save costs, they had better attend to it immediately.

I would further notice that it is useless for delinquents to apply to me to remit this fine, as no remission will be made. A written notice of the remission of their fines from their respective Colonies, will be satisfactory; other wise I shall have to proceed.

The delinquents' list is not as published: all therefore who know themselves to be such, had better call upon me forewith.

EX-PARTE JOSEPH SMITH, } Messrs. WALKER, ON HABEAS CORPUS. } PATRICK & SOUTH-} WORK, Counsel for } SMITH.

Mr. Mason, Counsel for REYNOLDS.
This case came before the court upon a return to a writ of habeas corpus, which was issued by this court, on the 30th of June, 1843, upon the petition of Joseph Smith, Senior, as follows:

STATE OF ILLINOIS, }
City of Nauvoo. }
To the Honorable the Municipal Court, of the City of Nauvoo, Hancock County, and State of Illinois:—

Your petitioner, Joseph Smith, Senior, who has been arrested by, and under the name of Joseph Smith, Junior, states on oath, that he is now detained as a prisoner, and in the custody of Joseph H. Reynolds, in the said city of Nauvoo, and state of Illinois, who claims to be the agent of the state of Missouri, and that your petitioner was arrested by one Harmon G. Wilson, by virtue of what purports to be a warrant issued by His Excellency, Thomas Ford, Governor of the state of Illinois, in the county of Lee, and state of Illinois, and by said Wilson, your petitioner was delivered into the custody of said Joseph H. Reynolds, and within the county of Lee, aforesaid, that said supposed warrant, so issued by His Excellency, Thomas Ford, Governor as aforesaid, and the arrest thereupon, and the imprisonment consequent thereupon, by said Wilson, and afterward by said Joseph H. Reynolds, is illegal, and in violation of law; and herein fail not, and bring this writ with you.

1st. The said supposed warrant so issued by the said Governor of the State of Illinois, as aforesaid, does not confer any authority to arrest your petitioner, for that it commands the officers therein named, to arrest one Joseph Smith, Junior, whereas, the name of your petitioner is Joseph Smith, Senior, and your petitioner avers that he is not known and reputed by the name of Joseph Smith, Junior.

2nd. The said supposed warrant is defective and void, for that it does not recite that the Joseph Smith, Junior, mentioned therein, has been demanded by the Executive of the State of Missouri, of the Executive of the State of Illinois.

3rd. Said supposed warrant, is defective and void, for that it does not state that said Joseph Smith, Junior, therein named, has been indicted or that any other legal accusation of any offence has been legally preferred, and is as pending against him in the said State of Missouri.

4th. It is defective and void, for that it does not show that any legal foundation was furnished by the Executive of the State of Missouri, upon which to issue the same; and your petitioner avers that the same was issued without due authority of law.

5th. Said supposed warrant is in other respects defective and void.

6th. The said Joseph H. Reynolds, has no authority to detain your petitioner in custody; for that he is not an officer of the State of Illinois, nor is he legally authorized by the said Governor of the State of Illinois, or otherwise, as the agent of the State of Missouri, in the State of Illinois, or in any other character and capacity to imprison your petitioner within the said State of Illinois.

7th. Your petitioner before the making of the said arrest upon which he is now detained and imprisoned, had been arrested for the same cause, and upon a charge for the same offence, for which he is now arrested and imprisoned, by virtue of a warrant issued by the Governor of the said State of Illinois, upon a requisition of the Executive authority of the said State of Missouri, and was discharged from said arrest and imprisonment by judgment of the Circuit Court of Warren county, at a court held in the said county of Warren, in or about the month of June, A. D. 1841, in such manner as not to be liable to the said second arrest for the same cause.

8th. Your petitioner is not a fugitive from justice, and has not fled from the justice of the said State of Missouri, and he is not guilty and has not been guilty of treason in or against the said State of Missouri.

9th. Your petitioner was not, and has not been within the limits of the said State of Missouri, for more than four years next, before the making of said arrest and imprisonment whereby he is now detained, nor for or during four years before any indictment or other legal accusation was preferred against him.

10th. Your petitioner avers that the said supposed warrant, so issued by the said Governor of the said State of Illinois, and under color of which your petitioner is now imprisoned, and the document purporting to be an authority to receive the said Joseph Smith, Junior, are wholly defective and insufficient to legally authorize the arrest and imprisonment of your petitioner: Copies of which supposed warrant and the supposed authority from the Executive of the State of Missouri are hereto annexed.

Wherefore, your petitioner prays that a writ of habeas corpus may be awarded, directed to the said Joseph H. Reynolds, commanding him that he bring your petitioner forth with and without delay, before this honorable court, together with the causes of his caption and detention, in order that your petitioner may be dealt with according to law; and your petitioner as in duty bound, will ever pray.

JOSEPH SMITH, Sen.

D. 1843, a copy of which warrant is hereto annexed and marked letter B, and delivered over to my custody as directed by said writ. The person of said Smith was, on said 23d of June, in the county of Lee and State of Illinois, by the said Wilson delivered over to my custody, and that I received and detained the said Smith in my custody by virtue of a certain warrant of attorney issued by the Governor of the State of Missouri, a copy of which is hereto annexed, and marked letter C, directing me to receive the said Smith, and convey him to and deliver him to the sheriff of Davies county in the State of Missouri, and that the within detention referred to, is the same referred to, and none other.

Done at the City of Springfield, this 17th day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-three, and of the Independence of the United States the sixty-seventh.

By the Governor, THOMAS FORD.

THOMAS CAMPBELL,
Secretary of State.

The following witnesses were examined, viz: Hyrum Smith, Parley P. Pratt, Brigham Young, George W. Pitkin, Lyman Wight, and Sidney Rigdon.

HYRUM SMITH sworn. Said that the defendant now in court is his brother, and that his name is not Joseph Smith Junior, but his name is Joseph Smith Senior, and has been for more than two years past. I have been acquainted with him ever since he was born, which was thirty-seven years in December last, and I have not been absent from him at any one time, not even the space of six months since his birth, to my recollection, and have been intimately acquainted with all his sayings, doings, business transactions and movements, as much as any one man could be acquainted with another man's business up to the present time, and do know that he has not committed treason against any State in the Union, by any overt act, or by levying war, or by aiding and abetting, or assisting an enemy in any State in the Union, and that the said Joseph Smith Senior has not committed treason in the State of Missouri, nor violated any law or rule of said State, I being personally acquainted with the transactions and doings of said Smith whilst he resided in said State, which was for about six months in the year 1838; I being also a witness, and I do know during the same period of time, or was within the State of Missouri, he being exempt by the amputation or extraction of a bone from his leg, and by his having a license to preach the Gospel, or being in other words a minister of the Gospel, and I do know that said Smith never bore arms, as a military man, in any capacity whatever, whilst in the State of Missouri, or previous to that time; neither has he given any orders or assumed any command in any capacity whatever; but I do know that whilst he was in the State of Missouri, that the People commonly called Mormons, were threatened with violence and extermination, and on or about the first Monday in August 1838, at the election at Gallatin, the county seat in Davies county: the citizens who were commonly called Mormons were forbidden to exercise the rights of franchise, and from that unbalanced circumstance an affray commenced, and a fight ensued among the citizens of that place, and from that time a mob commenced gathering in that county threatening the extermination of the Mormons; the said Smith and myself upon hearing that mobs were collecting together, and that they had also murdered two of the citizens of the same place, and would not suffer them to be buried; the said Smith and myself went over to Davies county to learn the particulars of the affray, but upon our arrival at Diahman, we learned that none were killed but several were wounded—we tarried all night at Col. Lyman Wight's, the next morning the weather being very warm and having been very dry for some time previously, the springs and wells in that region were dried up; on mounting our horses to return, we rode up to Mr. Black's, who was then an acting Justice of the Peace, to obtain some water for ourselves and horses; some few of the citizens accompanied us there, and after obtaining the refreshment of water, Mr. Black was asked by said Joseph Smith Senior, if he would use his influence to see that the laws were faithfully executed and to put down mob violence, and he gave us a paper, written by his own hand, stating that he would do so. He also requested him to call together the most influential men of the county on the next day that we might have an interview with them; to this he acquiesced, and accordingly the next day they assembled at the house of Col. Wight and entered into a mutual covenant of peace, to put down mob violence and to protect each other in the enjoyment of their rights: after this we all parted with the best of feelings and each man returned to his own home. This mutual agreement of peace however did not last long; for but a few days afterwards the mob began to collect again until several hundreds rendezvoused at Millport, a few miles distant from Diahman. They immediately commenced making aggressions upon the citizens called Mormons, taking away their hogs and cattle, and threatening them with extermination or utter extinction; saying that they had a cannon and there should be no compromise only at its mouth: frequently taking men, women and children prisoners, whipping them and lacerating their bodies with hickory withes, and tying them to trees and depriving them of food until they were compelled to gnaw the bark from the trees to which they were bound in order to sustain life; treating them in the most cruel manner they could invent or think of, and doing every thing they could to excite the indignation of the Mormon people to rescue them, in order that they might make that a pretext of an accusation for the breach of the law and that they might the better excite the prejudice of the populace and thereby get aid and assistance to carry out their hellish purposes of extermination. Immediately on the authentication of those facts, messengers were despatched from Far West to Austin A. King, Judge of the fifth judicial district of the State of Missouri, and also to Major General Atchison, Commander-in-chief of that division, and Brigadier General Doniphan, giving them information of the existing facts, and demanding immediate assistance. Gen. Atchison returned with the messengers and went immediately to Diahman and from thence to Millport, and he found the facts were true as reported to him; that the citizens of that county were assembled together in a hostile attitude to the amount of two or three hundred men, threatening the utter extermination of the Mormons, he immediately returned to Clay county and ordered out a sufficient military force to quell the mob. Immediately after they were dispersed and the army returned; the mob commenced collecting again soon after: we again applied for military aid, when General Doniphan came out with a force of sixty armed men to Far West; but they were in such a state of insubordination that he said he could not control them, and it was thought advisable by Col. Hinkle, Mr. Rigdon and others that they should return home; General Doniphan ordered Col. Hinkle to call out the militia of Caldwell and defend the town against the mob, for said he, you have great reason to be alarmed, for he said Neil Gillum from the Platte country had come down with 200 armed men and had taken up their station at Hunter's mill, a place distant about 17 or 18 miles north west of the town of Far West, and also that an armed force had collected again at Millport, in Davies county, consisting of several hundred men, and that another armed force had collected at DeWitt, in Carroll county, about 50 miles south east of Far West, where about 70 families of the Mormon people had settled upon the bank of the Missouri river at a little town called DeWitt. Immediately a messenger, whilst he was yet talking, came in from DeWitt, stating that three or four hundred men had assembled together at that place armed cap-a-pie, and that they had placed their arms in the hands of the citizens of town and cut off all supplies of food, so that many of them were suffering with hunger. Gen. Doniphan seemed to be very much alarmed, and appeared to be willing to do all he could to assist, and to relieve the sufferings of the Mormon people; he advised that a petition be immediately got up and sent to the Governor. A petition was accordingly prepared and a messenger despatched immediately to the Governor, and another petition was sent to Judge King. The Mormon people throughout the country were in a great state of alarm, and also in great distress; they saw themselves completely surrounded with armed forces on the north and on the north west and on the south, and also Bogard, who was a Methodist preacher, and who was then a captain over a militia company of 50 soldiers, but who had sided to his number out of the surrounding counties about a hundred more, which made his force about 150 strong, was stationed at Crooked Creek, sending out his scouting parties, taking men, women and children prisoners, driving off cattle, hogs and horses, entering into every house on Log and Long Creeks, rifling their houses of their most precious articles, such as money, bedding, and clothing, taking all their old muskets and their rifles or military implements, threatening the people with instant death if they did not deliver up all their precious things, and enter into a covenant to leave the state or go into the city of Far West by the next morning, saying that "they calculated to drive the people into Far West, and then drive them to hell." Gillum also was doing the same on the north west side of Far West; and Sashall Woods, a Presbyterian minister, was the leader of the mob in Davies county; and a very noted man of the same society was the leader of the mob in Carroll county and they were also sending out their scouting parties, robbing and pillaging houses, driving away hogs, horses and cattle, taking men, women and children and carrying them off, threatening their lives and subjecting them to all manner of abuses that they could invent or think of.

Under this state of alarm, excitement and distress, the messengers returned from the Governor and from the other authorities, bringing the fatal news, that the Mormons could have no assistance. They stated that the Governor said that "the Mormons had got into a difficulty with the citizens, and they might fight it out for all what he cared. He could not render them any assistance."

The people of DeWitt were obliged to leave their homes and go into Far West; but did not until after many of them had starved to death for want of proper sustenance, and several died on the road there, and were buried by the way side, without a coffin or a funeral ceremony, and the distress, sufferings, and privations of the people cannot be expressed. All the scattered families of the Mormon people, in all the counties except Davies, were driven into Far West, with but few exceptions.

This only increased their distress, for many thousands who were driven there, had no habitations or houses to shelter them, and were huddled together, some in tents and others under blankets, while others had no shelter from the inclemency of the weather. Nearly two months the people had been in this awful state of consternation, many of them had been killed, whilst others had been whipped until they had to swallow up their bowels to prevent them from falling out. About this time, General Parks came out from Richmond, Ray county, who was one of the commissioned officers who was sent out to Diahman, and I myself and my brother Joseph Smith Senior, went out at the same time. On the evening that General Parks arrived at Diahman, my brother, the late Don Carlos Smith's wife came in to Col. Wight's about eleven o'clock at night, bringing her two children along with her, one about two years and a half old; the other a babe in her arms. She came in on foot, a distance of three miles, and waded Grand River, and the water was then about waist deep; and the snow about 3 inches deep. She stated that a party of the mob, a gang of ruffians, had turned her out of doors, had taken her household goods and had burnt up her house, and she had escaped by the skin of her teeth. Her husband at that time was in Virginia, and she was living alone. This cruel transaction excited the feelings of the people in Diahman, especially Col. Wight, and he asked Gen. Parks, in my hearing, how long we had got to suffer such base violence? Gen. Parks said he did not know how long. Col. Wight then asked him what should be done? Gen. Parks told him "he should take a company of men, well armed, and go and disperse the mob wherever he should find any collected together, and take away their arms." Col. Wight did so precisely, according to the orders of Gen. Parks. And my brother Joseph Smith Senior, made no words about it. And after Col. Wight had dispersed the mob and put a stop to their burning houses belonging to the Mormon people and turning women and children out of doors, which they had done up to that time to the amount of 8 or 10 houses which were consumed to ashes—after being cut short in their intended designs, the mob started up a new plan. They went to work and moved their families out of the county and set fire to their houses, and not being able to incense the Mormons to commit crimes they had recourse to this stratagem to set their houses on fire and send runners into all the counties adjacent, to declare to the people that the Mormons had burnt up their houses and destroyed their fields, and if the people would not believe them, they would tell them to go and see if what they had said was true. Many people came to see, they saw the houses burning, and being filled with prejudice, they could not be made to believe but indeed the Mormons did not set them on fire, nor meddle with their houses or their fields. And the houses that were burnt, together with the pre-emption rights, and the corn in the fields, had all been previously purchased by the Mormons of the people and paid for in money and with wagons and horses and with other property, about two weeks before; but they had not taken possession of the premises; for this wicked transaction was for the purpose of exciting the minds of a prejudiced populace and the Executive, that they might get an order, that they could more easily carry out their hellish purposes, in expulsion or extermination or utter extinction of the Mormon people. After witnessing the distressed situation of the people in Diahman, my brother Joseph Smith Senior and myself returned back to the city of Far West, and immediately despatched a messenger, with written documents, to General Atchison, stating the facts as they did then exist, praying for assistance if possible, and requesting the editor of the "Far West" to insert the same in his newspaper, but he utterly refused to do so. We still believed that we should get assistance from the Governor, and again petitioned him, praying for assistance, setting forth our distressed situation; and in the mean time the pressing Judge of the County Court issued orders—upon affidavits made to him by the citizens—to the Sheriff of the county, to order out the Militia of the county to stand in constant readiness night and day to prevent the citizens from being massacred, which fearful situation they were exposed to every moment. Everything was very portentous and alarming. Notwithstanding all this, there was a ray of hope yet existing in the minds of the people that the Governor would render us assistance; and whilst the people were waiting anxiously for deliverance—men, women and children frightened, praying and weeping—we beheld at a distance, crossing the prairies and approaching the town, a large army in military array, brandishing their glittering swords in the sunshine, and we could not but feel joyful for a moment, thinking that probably the Governor had sent an armed force to our relief, notwithstanding the awful forebodings that pervaded our breasts. But to our great surprise, when the army arrived they came up and formed a line in double file in one half mile on the east of the city of Far West, and despatched three messengers with a white flag to come to the city. They were met by Captain Morey with a few other individuals, whose names I do not now recollect. I was myself standing close by, and could very distinctly hear every word they said. Being filled with anxiety, I rushed forward to the spot, expecting to hear good news—but alas! and heart-thrilling to every soul that heard them—they demanded three persons to be brought out of the city before they should massacre the rest. The names of the persons they demanded, were Adam Lightner, John Clomson and his wife. Immediately the three persons were brought forth to hold an interview with the officers who had made the demand, and the officers told them they had now a chance to save their lives, for they calculated to destroy the people and lay the city in ashes. They replied to the officers, and said, "If the people must be destroyed, and the city burned to ashes, they would remain in the city and die with them." The officers immediately returned, and the army retreated and encamped about a mile and a half from the city. A messenger was immediately despatched with a white flag from the Colonel of the Militia of Far West, requesting an interview with General Atchison and General Doniphan; but as the messenger approached the camp, he was shot at by Bogard, the Methodist preacher. The name of the messenger was Charles C. Rich, who is now Brigadier General in the Nauvoo Legion. However, he gained permission to see General Doniphan; he also requested an interview with General Atchison. General Doniphan said that General Atchison had been disappointed by a special order of the Governor a few miles back, and had been sent back to Liberty, Clay county. He also stated that the reason was, that he (Atchison) was too merciful unto the Mormons, and Bogard would not let him have the command, but had given it to General Lucas, who was from Jackson County, and whose heart had become hardened by his former acts of rapine and bloodshed, he being one of the leaders in murdering, driving, plundering and burning some two or three hundred houses belonging to the Mormon people in that county in the years 1838 and 1839.

Mr. Rich requested General Doniphan to spare the people, and not suffer them to be massacred until the next morning, it then being evening. He coolly agreed that he would not, and also said that "he had not as yet received the Governor's order, but aspected it every hour, and should not make any further move until he had received it; but he would not make any promises so far as regarded Neil Gillum's army," he having arrived a few minutes previously, and joined the main body of the army; he knowing well at what hour to form a junction with the main body. Mr. Rich then returned to the city, giving this information. The Colonel immediately despatched a second messenger with a white flag, to request another interview with General Doniphan, in order to show his sympathy and compassion, and if it were possible, for him to use his best endeavors to preserve the lives of the people. On the return of this messenger, we learned that several persons had been killed by some of the soldiers who were under the command of General Atchison, who were under the command of General Atchison, but his family were not permitted to approach him, nor any one else allowed to administer relief to him whilst he lay upon the ground, in the agonies of death. Mr. Carey had just arrived in the country, from the State of Ohio, only a few hours previous to the arrival of the army. He had a family, consisting of a wife and several small children. He was buried by Lucius N. Sevier, who is now the senior warden of the Nauvoo Lodge. Another man, of the name of John Tanner, was hooked on the head at the same time, and his skull laid bare the width of a man's hand, and lay, to all appearance, in the agonies of death for several hours; but by the permission of General Doniphan, his friends brought him out of the camp, and with good nursing he slowly recovered, and is now living. There was another man, whose name is Powell, who was bent on the head with the brisck of a gun until his skull was fractured and his brains run out in two or three places. He is now alive, and resides in this county, but has lost the use of his senses. Several persons of his family were also left for dead, but have since recovered. These acts of barbarity were also committed by the soldiers under the command of General Lucas, previous to having received the Governor's order of extermination.

It was on the evening of the 30th of October, according to the best of my recollection, that the army arrived at Far West, the sun about half an hour high. In a few moments afterwards, Cornelius Gillum arrived with his army, and formed a junction. This Gillum had been stationed at Hunter's mill for about two months previous to that time—committing depredations upon the inhabitants—capturing men, women and children, and carrying them off as prisoners, lacerating their bodies with hickory withes. The army of "Gillum" were painted like Indians, some of them were more conspicuous than were others, designated by red spots, and he, also, was painted in a similar manner, with red spots marked on his face, and styled himself the "DELAWARE CHIEF." They would whoop and hollow and yell as nearly like Indians as they could, and continued to do so all that night. In the morning early, the Colonel of Militia sent a messenger into the camp with a white flag, to have another interview with General Doniphan. On his return, he informed us that the Governor's order had arrived. General Doniphan said that "the order of the Governor was, to exterminate the Mormons by God, but he would be damned if he obeyed that order," but General Lucas might do what he pleased. We immediately learned from General Doniphan that "the Governor's order that had arrived was only a copy of the original, and that the original order was in the hands of Major General Clark, who was on his way to Far West, with an additional force of six thousand men." Immediately afterwards, there came into the city a messenger from Hann's Mill, bringing the intelligence of an awful massacre of the people who were residing in that place, and that a force of two or three hundred, detached from the main body of the army, under the superior command of Colonel Ashley, but under the immediate command of Captain Mahanah Comstock, who, the day previous, had promised them peace and protection, but on receiving a copy of the Governor's order "to exterminate or expel" from the hands of Colonel Ashley, he returned upon them the following day and surprised and massacred the whole population of the town, and then came on to the town of Far West and entered into conjunction with the main body of the army. The messenger informed us that he himself, with a few others fled into the thickets, which preserved them from the massacre, and on the following morning they returned and collected the dead bodies of the people and cast them into a well; and there were upwards of twenty who were dead or mortally wounded, and there are several of the wounded who are now living in a city. One, of the name of Yocum, has lately had his leg amputated, in consequence of wounds he then received. He had a ball shot through his head, which entered near his eye and came out at the back part of his head, and another ball passed through one of his arms.

The army, during all the while they had been encamped in Far West, continued to lay waste fields of corn, making hogs, sheep and cattle common plunder, and shooting them down for sport. One man shot a cow and took a strip of her skin, the width of his hand, from her head to her tail and tied it around a tree, to slip his halter into, to tie his horse to. The city was surrounded with a strong guard, and no man, woman or child was permitted to go out or come in, under the penalty of death. Many of the citizens were shot in attempting to go out to obtain sustenance for themselves and families. There was one field fenced in, consisting of twelve hundred acres, mostly covered with corn. It was entirely laid waste by the horses of the army, and the next day after the arrival of the army, towards evening, Colonel Hinkle came up from the camp, requesting to see my brother Joseph, Parley P. Pratt, Sidney Rigdon, Lyman Wight, and George W. Robinson, stating that the officers of the army wanted a mutual consultation with those men, also stating that General Doniphan, Lucas, Wilson and Graham—(however General Graham is an honorable exception; he did all he could to preserve the lives of the people, contrary to the order of the Governor.)—he, Hinkle, assured them that these generals had pledged their sacred honor that they should not be abused or insulted, but should be guarded back in safety in the morning, or as soon as the consultation was over. My brother Joseph replied that he did not know what good he could do in any consultation, as he was only a private individual; however he said that he was always willing to do all the good he could and would obey every law of the land, and then leave the event with God. They immediately started with Colonel Hinkle to go down into the camp. As they were going down about half way to the camp, they met General Lucas with a phalanx of men, with a wing to the right and to the left, and from near the battery in safety; but to their surprise, when they came up to General Lucas, he ordered his men to surround them, and Hinkle stepped up to the General and said, "These are the prisoners I agreed to deliver up." General Lucas drew his sword and said, gentlemen, you are my prisoners, and about that time the main army were on their march to meet them. They came up in two divisions, and opened to the right and left, and my brother and his friends were marched down through their lines, with a strong guard in front, and the cannon in the rear, to the camp, amidst the whoopings, howlings, yellings and shoutings of the army, which was so horrid and terrific that it frightened the inhabitants of the city. It is impossible to describe the feelings of horror and distress of the people. After being thus betrayed they were placed under a strong guard of thirty men, armed cap-a-pie, which they relieved every two hours. There they were compelled to lay on the cold ground that night, and were told in plain language, that they need never expect their liberties again. So far for their honors pledged. However, this was as much as could be expected from a mob under the garb of military and executive authority in the State of Missouri. On the next day, the soldiers were permitted to patrol the streets, to abuse and insult the people at their leisure, and enter into houses and pillage them, and ravish the women, taking away every gun and every other kind of arms or military implements; and about twelve o'clock on that day Colonel Hinkle came to my house with an armed force, opened the door and called me out of doors and delivered me up as a prisoner unto that force. They surrounded me and commanded me to march into the camp. I told them that I could not go; my family were sick, and I was sick myself, and could not leave home. They said they did not care for that—I must and should go. I asked when they would permit me to return. They made me no answer, but forced me along with the point of the bayonet into the camp, and put me under the same guard with my brother Joseph—and within about half an hour after wards, Amasa Lyman was also brought and placed under the same guard.—There we were compelled to stay all that night, and lie on the ground; but along some time in the same night, Colonel Hinkle came to me and told me that he had been pleading my case before the Court Martial, but he was afraid he should not succeed. He said there was a Court Martial then in session, consisting of thirteen or fourteen officers, Circuit Judge A. A. King, and Mr. Birch, District Attorney; also Sashel Woods, Presbyterian priest, and about 20 other priests of the different religious denominations in that country. He said they were determined to shoot us on the next morning in the public square in Far West. I made him no reply. On the next morning about sunrise, General Doniphan ordered his men to take up the line of march and leave the camp. He came to us where we were under guard, to shake hands with us, and bid us farewell. His first salutation was, "By God you have been sentenced by the court martial to be shot this morning; but I will be damned if I will have any of the honor of it, or any of the disgrace of it; therefore I have ordered my brigade to take up the line of march and to leave the camp, for (consider it to be cold blooded murder, and I bid you farewell,) and he went away. This movement of General Doniphan, made considerable excitement in the army, and there was considerable whispering amongst the officers. We listened very attentively, and frequently heard it mentioned by the guard, that the damned Mormons would not be shot this time. In a few moments the guard was relieved with a new set; one of those new guard said that the damned Mormons would not be shot this time, for the movement of General Doniphan had frustrated the whole plan, and that the officers had called another court martial, and had ordered us to be taken to Jackson county, and there to be executed; and in a few moments two large wagons drove up and we were ordered to get into them, and while we were getting into them, there came up four or five men armed with guns, who drew up and snatched their guns at us, in order to kill us, some flashed in the pan, and others only snuffed, but none of their guns went off. They were immediately arrested by several officers and their guns taken from them, and the drivers drove off. We requested of General Lucas to let us go to our houses and get some clothing; in order to do this, we had to be drove up into the city. It was with much difficulty that we could get his permission to go and see our families and get some clothing; but after considerable consultation, we were permitted to go under a strong guard of five or six men to each of us, and we were not permitted to speak to any one of our families, under the pain of death. The guard that went with me ordered my wife to get me some clothes immediately, within two minutes, and if she did not do it, I should go off without them. I was obliged to submit to their tyrannical orders, however painful it was with my wife and children clinging to my arms and to the skirts of my garments, and was not permitted to utter to them a word of consolation, and in a moment was hurried away from them at the point of the bayonet. We were hurried back to the wagons and ordered into them, all in about the same space of time. In between while our father, and mother, and sisters, had forced their way to the wagons to get permission to see us; but they were forbidden to speak to us; and they immediately drove off for Jackson county. We travelled about twelve miles that evening, and encamped for the night. The same strong guard was kept around us, and were relieved every two hours, and we were permitted to sleep on the ground, the nights were then cold, with considerable snow on the ground, and for the want of covering ourselves, we suffered extremely with the cold. That night was a commencement of a fit of sickness from which I have not wholly recovered unto this day, in consequence of my exposure to the inclemency of the weather. Our provision was fresh beef roasted in the fire on a stick; the army having no bread in consequence of the want of mills to grind the grain. In the morning at the dawn of day, we were exhibited a caravan of elephants or camels. They exhibited a caravan of elephants or camels. We were examined from head to foot, by men, women and children, only I believe they did not make us open our mouths to look at our teeth. This treatment was continued incessantly, until we arrived at Independence, in Jackson county. After our arrival at Independence, we were driven all through the town for inspection, and then we were ordered into an old log house, and there kept under guard as usual, until supper, which was served up to us as we sat upon the floor, or on billets of wood, and we were compelled to stay in that house all that night and the next day. They continued to exhibit us to the public, by letting the people come in and examine us, and then go away and give place for others, alternately all that day and the next night; but on the morning of the following day we were all permitted to go to the tavern to eat and to sleep; but after ward they made us pay our own expenses, for board, lodging, and attendance, and for which they made a most exorbitant charge. We remained in the tavern about two days and two nights, when an officer arrived with authority from General Clark, to take us back to Richmond, Ray county, where the general had arrived with his army to await our arrival there; but on the morning of our start for Richmond, we were informed by General Wilson, that it was expected by the soldiers that we would be hung up by the necks on the road, while on the march to that place, and that it was prevented by a demand made for us by General Clark, who had the command in consequence of seniority, and that it was his prerogative to execute us himself; and he should give us up into the hands of the officer, who would take us to General Clark, and he might do with us as he pleased. During our stay at Independence, the officers informed us that there were eight or ten horses in that place belonging to the Mormon people, which had been stolen by the soldiers, and that we might have two of them to ride upon, if we would cause them to be sent back to the owners after our arrival at Richmond. We accepted of them, and they were rode to Richmond, and the owners came there and got them. We started in the morning under our new officer, Colonel Price, of Keosauqua, Chariton county, with several other men to guard us over. We arrived there on Friday evening, the 9th day of November, and were thrust into an old log house, with a strong guard placed over us. After we had been there for the space of half an hour, there came in a man who was said to have some notoriety in the penitentiary, bringing in his hands a quantity of chains and padlocks. He said he was commanded by General Clark to put us in chains. Immediately the soldiers rose up and pointing their guns at us, placed their thumb on the cock, and their finger on the trigger; and the state's prison keeper went to work; putting a chain around the leg of each man, and fastening it on with a padlock, until we were all chained together, seven of us.

In a few moments came in General Clark, we requested to know of him what was the cause of all this harsh and cruel treatment.—He refused to give us any information at that time; but said he would in a few days; so we were compelled to continue in that situation, clanking on the floor, all chained together, without any chance or means to be made comfortable; having to eat our victuals as it was served up to us, using our fingers and teeth instead of knives and forks. Whilst we were in this situation, a young man of the name of Grant, brother-in-law to my brother William Smith, came to see us, and put up at the tavern where General Clark made his quarters, he happened to come in time to see General Clark make choice of his men, to shoot us on Monday morning, the 12th day of November, he saw them make choice of their rides, and load them with two balls in each, and after they had prepared their guns, General Clark saluted them by saying "Gentlemen, you shall have the honor of shooting the Mormon leaders on Monday morning at eight o'clock." But in consequence of the influence of our friends, the heathen general was intimidated, so that he durst not carry his murderous designs into execution, and sent a messenger immediately to Fort Leavenworth to obtain the military code of laws. After the messenger's return, the general was employed nearly a whole week, examining the laws; so Monday passed away without our being shot; however, it seemed like foolishness to me for so great a man as General Clark pretended to be, should have to search the military law to find out whether preachers of the gospel, who never did military duty, could be subject to court martial. However, the general seemed to learn this fact after searching the military code, and came into the old log cabin where we were under guard, and in chains, and told us he had concluded to deliver us over to the civil authorities; as persons guilty of treason, murder, arson, larceny, theft, and stealing. The poor deluded general did not know the difference between theft, larceny, and stealing. Accordingly we were handed over to the pretended civil authorities, and the next morning our chains were taken off, and we were guarded to the court-house, where there was a pretended court in session; Austin A. King being the judge, and Mr. Birch, the district attorney—the two extremely and very honorable gentlemen who sat on the court nuptial when we were sentenced to be shot. Witnesses were called up and sworn of the point of the bayonet and if they would not swear to the things they were told to do, they were threatened with instant death, and I do know, positively, that the evidence given in by these men whilst under duress, was false. This state of things was continued twelve or fourteen days, and after that time we were ordered by the judge, to introduce some rebutting evidence, saying, if we did not do it, we would be thrust into prison. I could hardly understand what the judge meant; for I considered we were in prison already, and could not think of any thing but the persecutions of the days of Nero, knowing that it was a religious persecution, and the court an inquisition; however, we gave him the names of forty persons who were acquainted with all the persecutions and sufferings of the people.—The judge made out a subpoena, and I to be called to the stand to answer the charges against me. I was called to the stand, and I took fifty armed soldiers and started for Far West. I saw the subpoena given to him and his company, when they started. In the course of a few days they returned with most all those forty men, whose names were inserted in the subpoena and thrust them into jail, and we were not permitted to bring one of them before the court, but the judge turned upon us with an air of indignation and said, gentlemen you must get your witnesses or you shall be committed to jail immediately; for we are not going to hold the court open on expense much longer, for you any how. We felt very much distressed and oppressed at that time. Colonel Wight said, what shall we do? Our witnesses are all thrust into prison, and probably will be, and we have no power to do any thing, of course we must submit to this tyranny and oppression; we cannot help ourselves. Several others made similar expressions in the agony of their souls; but my brother Joseph did not say any thing, he being sick at that time with the tooth ache, and ague in his face, in consequence of a severe cold brought on by being exposed to the severity of the weather. However, it was considered best by General Doniphan and Lawyer Reese, that we should try to get some witnesses before the pretended court. Accordingly, I myself gave the names of about twenty other persons; the judge inserted them in a subpoena, and caused it to be placed into the hands of Bogard the Methodist priest, and he again started off with his fifty soldiers to take those men prisoners, as he had done to the forty others. The judge sat and laughed at the good opportunity of getting the names, that they might the more easily capture them, and so bring them down to be thrust into prison, in order to prevent us from getting the truth before the pretended court, of which himself was the chief inquisitor or conspirator. Bogard returned from his second expedition with one prisoner only, when he again thrust us to prison.

The people at Far West had learned the intrigue and had left the State, having been made acquainted with the treatment of the former witnesses. But we, on learning that we could not obtain witnesses; whilst privately consulting with each other what we should do, discovered a Mr. Allen, standing by the window on the outside of the house, we beckoned to him as though we would have him come in, he immediately came in. At that time Judge King retorted upon us again, saying, gentlemen you are not going to introduce some witnesses; also, saying it was the last day he should hold the court open for us, and if we did not rebut the testimony that had been given against us, he should have to commit us to jail. I had then got Mr. Allen into the house, and before the court, so called. I told the judge we had one witness, if he would be so good as to put him under oath; he seemed unwilling to do so; but after a few moments consultation, the state's attorney arose and said he should object to that witness being sworn, and that he should object to that witness giving in his evidence at all; stating that this was not a court to try the case, but only a court of investigation on the part of the state. Upon this, General Doniphan arose, and said he would be God damned if the witness should not be sworn, and that it was a damned shame that these defendants should be treated in this manner; that they could not be permitted to get one witness before the court whilst all their witnesses, even for a time, have been taken in force of arms, and thrust into the "bull-pen" in order to prevent them from giving their testimony. After Doniphan sat down, the judge permitted the witness to be sworn, and enter upon his testimony. But so soon as he began to speak, a man by the name of Cook, who was a brother-in-law to Priest Bogard, the Methodist, and who was a lieutenant, and whose place at that time, was to superintend the guard, stepped in before the pretended court, and took him by the nape of his neck and jammed his head down under the pole or log of wood, that was placed up around the place where the inquisition was sitting, to keep the by-standers from intruding upon the majesty of the inquisitors; and jammed him along to the door, and kicked him out of doors. He instantly turned to some soldiers who were standing by him, and said to them, "Go and shoot him, damn him, shoot him, damn him!" The soldiers ran after the man to shoot him, he fled for his life and with great difficulty made his escape. The pretended court immediately arose, and we were ordered to be carried to Liberty, Clay county, and there to be thrust into jail. We endeavored to find out for what cause, but all that we could learn was because we were Mormons. The next morning a large wagon drove up to the door, and a blacksmith came into the house with some chains and handcuffs, he said his orders were from the judge, to handcuff us, and chain us together, he informed us that the judge had made out a mittimus, and sentenced us, to jail for treason; he also said the judge had done this that we might not get bail; he also said the judge stated his intention to keep us in jail until all the Mormons were driven out of the state; he also said that the judge had further stated that if he let us out before the Mormons had left the state, that we would not let them leave, and there would be another damned fuss kicked up; I also heard the judge say myself, whilst he was sitting in his pretended court, that there was no law for us, nor the Mormons, in the State of Missouri; that he had sworn to see them exterminated, and to see the Governor's order executed to the very letter, and that he would do so; however, the blacksmith proceeded and put the irons upon us, and we were ordered into the wagon and they drove off for Clay county, and as we journeyed along on the road, we were exhibited to the inhabitants and this course was adopted all the way, thus making a public exhibition of us, until we arrived at Liberty, Clay County. There we were thrust into prison again, and looked upon and were held there in close confinement for the space of six months, and our place of lodging was the square side of a hewed white oak log, and our food was any thing but good and decent; poison was administered to us three or four times, the effect it had upon our system, stupid, stupid state, not even caring or wishing for life. The poison being administered in ten large doses, or it would inevitably have proved fatal, had not the power of Jehovah interposed in our behalf, to save us from their wicked purpose. We were also subjected to the necessity of eating human flesh, for the space of five days, or go without food, except a little coffee, or a little corn bread, the latter I chose in preference to the former. We none of us parrot of the flesh except Lyman Wight; we also heard the guard which was placed over us making sport of us, saying that they had fed us upon "Mormon beef." I have described the appearance of this flesh to several experienced physicians, and they have decided that it was human flesh. We learned afterwards, by one of the guard, that it was supposed that that act of savage cannibalism, in feeding us with human flesh, would be considered a popular deed of notoriety; but the people on learning that it would not take, tried to keep it secret; but the fact was noised abroad before they took that precaution. Whilst we were incarcerated in prison, we petitioned the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri for habeas corpus, twice, but were refused both times by Judge Reynolds, who is now the Governor of that State. We also petitioned one of the county judges for a writ of habeas corpus, which was granted in about three weeks afterwards; but we were not permitted to have any trial; we were only taken out of jail and kept out for a few hours and then remanded back again. In the course of three or four days after that time, Judge Turnham came into the jail in the evening, and said he had permitted Mr. Rigdon to get bail, but said he had to do it in the night, and had also to get away in the night, and unknown to any of the citizens, or they would kill him; for they had sworn to kill him if they could find him; and as to the rest of us, he dared not let us go, for fear of our own life, as well as ours. He said it was damned hard to be confined under such circumstances, for he knew we were innocent men, and he said the people also knew it; and that it was only a persecution and treachery, and the scenes of Jackson county acted over again, for fear that we would become too numerous in that upper country. He said the plan was concocted from the governor down to the lowest judge, and that that damned Baptist priest, Riley, who was riding into town every day to watch the people, stirring up the minds of the people against us all he could, exhorting them and stirring up their religious prejudices against us, for fear they would let us go. Mr. Rigdon, however, got bail and made his escape to Illinois. The jailer, Samuel Tillery, Esq., told us also, that the whole plan was concocted by the governor down to the lowest judge in that upper country, early in the previous spring, and that the plan was more fully carried out at the time that General Atchison went down to Jefferson City, with General Wilson, Lucas and Gillum, the self-styled "Deleware Chieft." This was some time in the month of September, when the mob were collected at De Witt, in Carroll county. He also told us that the governor was now ashamed enough of the whole transaction and would be glad to set us at liberty if he could to do it; but said he, you need not be concerned, for the governor has held a plea of your release. He also said that Squire Birch, the State's Attorney, was appointed to be Circuit Judge, on the circuit passing through Davies county, and that he (Birch) was instructed to fix the papers, so that we would be sure to be clear from any incumbrance, in a very short time. Sometime in April, we were taken to Davies county, as they said, to have a trial, but when we arrived at that place, instead of finding a court or a jury, we found another inquisition, and Birch, who was the district attorney, the same man who was one of the court martial when we were sentenced to death, was now the circuit judge of that pretended court; and the grand jury that was empanelled, were all at the massacre at Hawn's Mill, and lively actors in that awful, solemn, disgraceful, cold-blooded murder, and all the pretence they made of excuse, was, they had done it because the governor ordered them to do it. The same jury sat as a jury in the day time, and were placed over us as a guard in the night time; they tantalized and teased over us, of their great achievements at Hawn's Mills, and at other places, telling us how many houses they had burned, and how many sheep, cattle and hogs they had driven off, belonging to the Mormons, and how many rapists they had committed, and what squalling and kicking there was among the damned bitches; saying that they had one woman upon one of the damned Mormon meeting benches, tying her hands and her feet fast, and sixteen of them abused her as much as they had a mind to, and then left her bound and exposed in that distressed condition. These fiends of the lower region boasted of these acts of barbarity, and tantalized our feelings with them for ten days. We had heard of these acts of cruelty previous to this time, but we were slow to believe that such acts of cruelty had been perpetrated. The lady who was the subject of their brutality, did not recover her health, to be able to help herself for more than three months afterwards. This grand jury constantly celebrated their achievements with grog and glass in hand, like the Indian warriors at their war dances, singing and telling each other of their exploits, in murdering the Mormons, in plundering their houses and carrying off their property; at the end of every song they would bring in the chorus: God damn God, God damn Jesus Christ, God damn the Presbyterians, God damn the Baptists, God damn the Methodists, retortering one sect after another in the same manner, until they came to the Mormons, to them it was, "God damn the God damn Mormons; we have sent them to hell." Then they would slap their hands and shout hosanna, hanna, glory to God, and fall down on their backs, and kick with their feet a few moments; then they would pretend to have swooned away into a glorious trance, in order to imitate some of the transactions at camp meetings. Then they would pretend to come out of their trance, and would shout and again slap their hands and jump up, while it down each other's necks, crying "damn it, take it, you must take it; and if any one refused to drink the whiskey, others would clutch him whilst another poured it down his neck, and what did not go down the inside, went down the outside; this is a part of the farce acted by the g and jury of Davies county, whilst they stood over us as guards, for ten nights successively. And all this in the presence of the great Judge Birch, who had previously said in our hearing, that there was no law for the Mormons in the state of Missouri. His brother was then acting as district attorney in that circuit, and if any thing was a greater criminal than the judge, after all these ten days of drunkenness, we were informed that we were indicted for treason, murder, arson, larceny, theft and stealing. We asked for a change of venue from that county to Marion county, but they would not grant it; but they gave us a change of venue from Davies to Boone county; and a mittimus was made out by the pretended Judge Birch, without date, name or place. They fitted us out with a two horse wagon, and horses, and four men, besides the sheriff, to be our guard; they were five of us. We started from Gallatin the sun about two hours high, P. M., and went as far as Diahman that evening and staid till morning. There we bought two horses of the guard and paid for one of them in our clothing, which we had with us, and for the other we gave our note. We went down that day as far as Judge Morin's, a distance of some four or five miles. There we staid until the morning, when we started on our journey to Boone county, and travelled on the road about twenty miles distance. There we bought a jug of whiskey, with which we treated the company, and while there the sheriff showed us the mittimus, before referred to, without date or signature, and said that Judge Birch told him never to carry us to Boone county, and never to show the mittimus; and said he, I shall take a good drink of grog and go to bed, and you may do as you have a mind to. Three others of the guard drank pretty freely of whiskey, sweetened with honey; they also went to bed, and were soon asleep; and the other guard, went along with us and helped to saddle the horses. Two of us mounted the horses, and the other three started on foot, and we took our change of venue for the State of Illinois; and in the course of nine or ten days arrived safely at Quincy, Adams county, where we found our families in a state of poverty, although in good health; they having been driven out of the state previously; by the murderous militia, under the exterminating order of the Executive of Missouri; and now the people of that state, a portion of them, would be glad to make the people of this state believe that my brother Joseph had committed treason, for the purpose of keeping up their murderous and hellish persecution, and they seem to be unrelenting, and thirsting for the blood of innocence, for I do know most positively that my brother Joseph has not committed treason, nor violated any solitary item of law or rule, in the State of Missouri. But I do know that the Mormon people, en masse, were driven out of that State, after being robbed of all they had, and they barely escaped with their lives; as well as my brother Joseph, who barely escaped with his life, his family also, was robbed of all they had, and barely escaped with the skin of their teeth; and all of this in consequence of the exterminating order of Governor Boggs, the same being confirmed by the Legislature of that State. And I do know—as does this court, and every rational man who is acquainted with the circumstances, and every man who shall hereafter become acquainted with the particulars thereof—will know, that Governor Boggs, and Generals Clark, Lucas, Wilson and Gillum, also Austin A. King, have committed treason upon the citizens of Missouri, and did violate the Constitution of the United States, and also the Constitution and laws of the State of Missouri; and did exile and expel, at the point of the bayonet, some twelve or fourteen thousand inhabitants from the State, and did murder some three or four hundreds of men, women and children in cold blood, and in the most horrid and cruel manner possible, and the whole of it was caused by religious bigotry and persecution, because the Mormons dared to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences, and agreeably to His divine will, as revealed in the scriptures of eternal truth, and had turned away from following the vain traditions of their fathers, and would not worship according to the dogmas and commandments of those men who preach for hire and divine for money, and teach for doctrine the precepts of men—expecting that the Constitution of the United States would have protected them therein. But notwithstanding the Mormon people had purchased upwards of two hundred thousand dollars, worth of land, most of which was entered and paid for at the land office of the United States in the State of Missouri—and although the President of the United States has been made acquainted with these facts, and the particulars of our persecutions and oppressions, by petition to him, and to Congress—yet they have not even attempted to restore the Mormons to their rights, or given any assurance that we may hereafter expect redress from them. And I do also know, most positively and assuredly, that my brother, Joseph Smith, Senior, has not been in the State of Missouri since the spring of the year 1839. And further this Deponent saith not.

An apology is due to the members of the Society for our delay in presenting this report. We would only say, it was unavoidable in consequence of circumstances beyond the control of the Treasurer, Mrs. E. A. Holmes, which rendered it impossible for her to make satisfactory returns at an earlier period.

We hope the Ladies of the Society will feel encouraged to renew their exertions, knowing that the blessings of the poor are resting upon them: We feel assured from what has passed under our personal observation, that many during the inclemency of the winter, were not only relieved, but preserved from famishing, through their instrumentality. More has been accomplished than our most sanguine anticipations predicted, and through the assistance and blessing of God, what may we not hope for the future?

By Order of the President.

ELIZA R. SNOW, Secretary.
Nauvoo June 30th 1843.

One hundred and eighteen known murders were committed in the United States in the year 1842. How many undiscovered ones were perpetrated—time will perhaps develop.

BRUTAL OUTRAGE AND MURDER.

We have just heard that a most brutal outrage and murder was lately perpetrated on the Allegheny river near the Great Western Furnace. We have not been furnished with the names, dates or particulars, and therefore can only give an outline of the horrid transaction. By a late act of Assembly no ardent spirits is permitted to be sold within certain described limits including that Furnace. It appears that a boat containing the article was brought up from Pittsburg and fastened to the shore, within the limits or not, we are unable to state. A number of persons collected; and after drinking in excess, as our informant stated, a quarrel ensued between them and one of the men attached to the boat. They drove him on to the shore and pelted him with stones, till he was compelled to seek refuge by swimming the river—before he went into the water, however, one of his arms was broken or injured. While attempting to effect his escape, it is supposed that he was struck on the head by a stone—and when about sinking called to his cousin who was in a skiff at the beach to come out and save him—but the infuriated mob held the skiff fast, till he sank in the river and was drowned. Bad as was the conduct of these spirit vendors, it affords no excuse or palliation for his murderers, since they were participants in the illegal and pernicious traffic that led to the outrage. Oh that a man would put an enemy into his mouth to steal away his brains.—(Clarion Republican.)

THE PIRATE OF THE ISLE OF PINES.

We find in the New Orleans Tropic an article in relation to the piratical vessel seen so often of late in the vicinity of the Isle of Pines that gives additional weight to the opinion already very general, that this vessel is the Texan schooner San Antonio. Capt. Seeger, her commander, who is spoken of in the Tropic as a brave officer and an irreproachable gentleman, has in the opinion of his relations, fallen a victim to a preconcerted plan of mutiny. Circumstances, it appears, came to the knowledge of a brother of Capt. Seeger just previous to the sailing of the vessel from Galveston which induced him to warn his brother against certain men on board, who were in his opinion, capable of any atrocity, and who held offices of considerable importance. What these circumstances are, it is not stated, but the belief of Mr. Seeger is, that the crew, led on by two or three officers, mutinized, murdered the captain and all who could not be made useful, (the programme exactly of the intended mutiny on board the Sommers,) and then entered upon their career of rapine and murder.

The opinion is universal in New Orleans that the San Antonio is still afloat, and at the departure of Commodore Moore's squadron from that port, intelligence was received that two seamen, known to have sailed from Galveston in San Antonio, were in New Orleans; and that one of them incautiously declared that the San Antonio was in good hands and could be heard of on application at St. Jago de Cuba. Search was made for these men by the Texas officers, but they were nowhere to be found. We have always been inclined to believe, ever since the return of the Somers to this port, the story of the mutiny on board the San Antonio. The alarm caused by the appearance of their piratical craft has at all events now become so general that before long some more definite information will be obtained.—[N. Y. Amer.]

STYLE OF ROYAL COURTSHIP.

Prince de Joinville, the youngest son of the King of the French, has married a young American Princess—the sister of the young Emperor of Brazil. The act of popping the question was done by proxy. The Prince arrived at Rio Janeiro early in April (according to the papers received at New York lately by the Horatia) the Baron Longdorski Ambassador from the King of the French, had his formal reception by the Emperor. To ask the hand of the Princess Francesca Carolina for the Prince. As our readers may be curious to see how these delicate matters are transacted in high life, we copy from the Commercial the following account of the interview:

The Baron said:—
"The King, my august sovereign, has just the hand of her imperial highness the Princess Donna Francesca, your Majesty's sister, for Monsieur, the Prince de Joinville."

Nothing could be more grateful to the heart of the King than a union which would draw more close the ties of family that already link together the two dynasties, and the ties of friendship that unite the two nations. I venture to hope that your Majesty's feelings are the same. Having been permitted to enter that family sanctuary within which monarchs lay aside the pomp that now surrounds your Majesty, I have found the same, those private virtues, those tender and sweet affections which France admires also in the august house that governs herself. In putting from a brother whose love has watched over her youth with so much solicitude, and from a beloved sister whose virtues secure to her universal affection and respect, the Princess Francesca will take her place in the midst of that royal family so closely united and so devoted to each other. Her happiness will only be transferred to another scene, and will receive in its reliance on a husband whose name has already become known through out the world, guarantees of that permanence to which the charming virtues of her imperial highness so eminently entitle her."

The Emperor replied:—
"I consent with all my heart to that alliance which is so pleasing to me, and in which the Brazilians will so cordially rejoice."

My sister, to whom you will now address yourself, will assuredly confirm this my answer; for we are persuaded that she will find in the affection of the royal family of France a sweet solace for the regrets she must need feel in leaving the country that gave her birth."

The Baron then addressed the Princess in these words:—

"Madame! The happiness of Monsieur the Prince de Joinville would not be complete without your gracious confirmation of the reply which the Emperor, your august brother, has given me. It is from yourself also that his Royal highness desires to obtain your hand. More fortunate than most princes, he has been permitted to see and appreciate for himself those eminent qualities which distinguish your Imperial highness. Your heart, madame, will thank him for having desired that it should be so."

You will not come as a stranger, madame, in the bosom of that new family which impatiently awaits you. You will find there that fraternal affection which you know so well. You will find there the tenderness of a mother who already loves you as her daughter, and who will show you, by the most touching examples, what holiness and lustre private virtue can add to the most exalted station."

The princess then replied as follows:—

"Monsieur Minister, I am happy in confirming the answer of my august brother."

I am persuaded that the affection of the royal family of France will soften the regrets that I must feel in leaving my country, and a beloved brother and sister."

At the close of the ceremony the Baron proceeded on board the frigate Belle Poule, where he communicated to the Prince de Joinville the answer of the Emperor and Princess. All the French vessels in the harbor then hoisted the Brazilian flag and fired a salute of 21 guns, which was answered from the batteries and the Brazilian brig of war Third of May.

The marriage was to take place about the 3d or 4th of May, and he was then to sail direct for France with his bride. The inhabitants of Rio were much pleased at the marriage. The Emperor had sent a frigate to Naples to bring home his Empress, the Neapolitan King's sister; she was looked for daily.

THE MECHANIC IN STRAITS.

BY CHARLES QUILL.

Historians have been busy for several years, but they have not described any one class of men which is exempt from trouble. The most sturdy beggars, in the greatest paradise of mankind, are sometimes brought to a nonplus. Bolivar, the champion of the wealthiest empire yet recorded, was reduced to beg his farthing. And a European king, in the last century, died penniless in England.

After this becoming preface, we may go fairly to work on our subject. I heartily sympathize with the man who is reduced to want, without his own fault; especially if he is a man who earns his bread by the sweat of his brow; and, most of all, if he has to share his sorrow and loss with a confiding wife and helpless children. There are many such, for we meet them in almost every walk; downcast and unemployed; there are more than we at first supposed, for the greatest sufferers shun the glare of observation.

American mechanics are said to have money, and Mrs. Trollope writes, that we cannot hear two Americans talking together for five minutes, without the repetition of the word dollar. Jeremy Bentham makes the same remark of the low English, except that for dollar he reads pence. Europeans seem resolved to fix on the charge of loving gold. If this be true in any discreditable sense, it is so in sense different from that of olden time. The money lover of our day is bad enough, but he is not the miser of old stories. He grasps, but does not hoard. The excitement which drives him on to rapid gains is only one branch of a wider excitement moving many branches, characteristic of our time and country, and susceptible of a direction to good as well as evil. The old time money maker was a tortoise, and when a storm came he closed his shell.

But the tempest drenches, and peradventure stuns him, but at the first laughing sunshine he is again on the wing. Let the mechanic in straits hope strongly for deliverance. Many are now reduced to great difficulties by changes in the commercial world, which they had no hand in producing. In such circumstances when the father of a family sees the dearest object of his affections brought into want and distress, there is a great temptation to discontent and repining. This tendency must be resisted—it never did any good, and it never can. No man ever gained by grumbling. Complaint, recriminations, and even curses, serve neither to make the hunger smaller nor the loaf larger. Stick a pin there, and consider. Here is a starting point.

Not many hours ago I heard Uncle Benjamin discoursing this matter to his son. "Rely upon it, Sammy," said the old man, as he leaned on his staff, with his gray locks flowing in the breeze of a May morning, "murmuring pays no bills. I have been an observer these fifty years, and I never saw a man helped out of a hole by cursing his horses. Be as quiet as you can, for nothing will grow under a moving harrow, and discontent harrows the mind. Matters are bad, I acknowledge, but no ulcer is any the better for lingering. The more you groan the poorer you grow."

Repining at losses is only putting pepper into a sore eye. Crops may fail in all soils, and we may be thankful that we have not a famine. Besides, I always took notice that whenever I felt the rod pretty smartly, it was as much as to say, "Here is something which you have got to learn." Sammy don't forget that your schooling is not over yet, though you have a wife and two children."

"Ay," cried Sammy, "you say that, and a mother in law and two apprentices to boot." And I should like to know what a poor man can learn here, when the greatest scholars and lawyers are at loggerheads, and can't for their lives tell what has become of the hard money."

"Softly, Sammy! I am older than you. I have not got these gray hairs and this crooked back without some burdens. I could tell you stories of the days of continental money, when my grandfather used to stuff a sulkey box with bills in order to pay for a yearling or a wheat fan; and when Jersey women used thorns for pins, and laid their teapots away in the gutter."

You wish to know what you may learn? You may learn these seven things:

First, That you have saved too little and spent too much. I never taught you to be a miser, but I have seen you giving your dollar for a notion, when you might have laid one half aside for charity, and another half for a rainy day.

Secondly, That you have gone too much on credit. I always told you that credit was a shadow; it shows that there is a substance behind which casts the shadow; and no wise man will follow the shadow any further than he can see substance. You may now learn that you have followed the opinion and fashion of others till you have been decoyed into a bog.

Thirdly, That you have been in too much haste to get rich. Slow and easy wins the race.

Fourthly, That no course of life can be depended upon as always prosperous. I am afraid the younger race of working men in America have had a notion that nobody could go to ruin on this side of the water. Providence has greatly blessed us, but we have become presumptuous.

Fifthly, That you have not been thankful enough to God for his benefits in time past.

Sixthly, That you may be thankful that our lot is no worse; we might have famine, or pestilence, or war, or tyranny, or altogether.

And lastly, to end my sermon, you may learn to offer with more understanding the prayer of your infancy, "give us this day our daily bread."

The old man bowed, and Sammy put on his apron, and told Dick to blow away at the forge bellows.

THE NEIGHBOR.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 12, 1843.

Joseph Smith—is at Nauvoo, in peace, quietly pursuing his own business; where we hope he will long remain free from the power of his inhuman persecutors.

The testimony already given, needs no comment. It shows but too plainly the inhumanity, recklessness, barbarism and lawlessness of the State of Missouri; and we could wish for the sake of humanity, for the sake of suffering innocence, and for the sake of our honored institutions, that our nation's escutcheon had never been stained by the inhuman acts, and bloody deeds of Missouri; and that the non efficiency of the nation to execute law had not been so fully developed. But it is too true, we have witnessed most of the things mentioned by Mr. Smith, and we have also witnessed the carelessness and apathy of Congress on this subject, or their inefficiency to remedy the evil, the which, had it been fully investigated, and the perpetrators of these damning crimes brought to condign punishment, it would have exposed a blacker history than ever was written of any Pagan, not to say a Christian nation, and would have exposed half of that State to the charge of treason, murder, robbery, arson, burglary & extermination.

As it is the blood of the innocent yet cries for vengeance, and if it owe takes them not here, and God spares my breath, if no one else does it their deeds shall be handed down to posterity that unborn generations may execrate these unrepentant cannibals, and tell that in the State of Missouri lived a horde of Americans, who in the face of open day, dragged the innocent to prison, because of their religion; who murdered the oppressed, that they had in their power, and fed their victims with their flesh; that they glutted their diabolical lust on defenseless innocents, and violated female chastity in a manner too horrid to relate—that in their mock tribunals they refused all testimony in favor of the accused, and thrust their witnesses into prison, that after robbing them of their property, they drove 15,000 persons from the state—that they cried to the authorities of that state for redress, and from them to Congress; but the echo from both was, we can render you no assistance.

As we stated, we have further remarks to make, in relation to the trial of Gen. Joseph Smith, but shall withhold them until the testimony of the several witnesses shall be concluded, which will be done at the earliest convenience.

Ireland.—Great excitement exists at present in Ireland in relation to the subject of repeal. O'Connell is using all his influence for the accomplishment of that object, how far he will be able to succeed time alone must determine. Large meetings have been got up all over the country and many of the most respectable people in Ireland are uniting with the repeaters; large weekly subscriptions are taken up, amounting to from 700 to 1000 pounds weekly, under the name of "Repeal Rent" for the purpose of carrying on their object of repeal. Speeches are being made in all parts of the island, and the greatest excitement prevails. The English Government, in the meantime are not silent, nor their Legislators idle spectators of the scene. There has been a most animated discussion in the House of Commons, on the subject, and although the same untoward disposition has been manifested, which has existed for years past towards that afflicted and oppressed people, a fear evidently exists that Ireland may do something. Re-enforcements are being sent unto the army. The garrisons and forts ordered to be put into repair; their arsenals are being replenished, and all precautionary measures adopted. The repeaters have as yet taken no hostile stand; what they may ultimately do time alone must unfold. We cannot but think however from present appearances, that they will have repeal "peaceably" if they can, forcibly if they must. Large and spirited meetings have been held in New York and elsewhere, on the subject for the purpose of expressing their opinions, opening a communication with, and forwarding means to the repeaters on the other side of the Atlantic. Besides the emigrants from "Krin's Isle," of which there is a great number, thousands of American citizens of all grades have united with them, among which many M. C.'s, H. S.'s, and H. R.'s, and other notable characters have taken a very active part; indeed the people in general seem to sympathize with the oppressed Irish, and all are anxious that they should take their harp from the willows, and that Erin should once more be free.

Scotland.—There has been a great eruption in the Scotch Church. "The Glasgow (Scotch) Saturday Post," gives the details of as great a storm and disruption of the Church of Scotland as any upon record. Upwards of 400 of their principle ministers have voluntarily seceded, and left the church, in consequence of their interference by the Parliament with their religious rights, (which we have no room to insert at present.) expressed sorrow that they should thus, in order to maintain the dignity of the church, be consciously obliged to leave; and the next day met under the denomination of the "General Assembly of The Free Presbyterian Church."

This proceeding must certainly produce a great revolution in the minds of the inhabitants of Scotland, particularly those belonging to the Kirk; and we think that unless the British Parliament use some conciliating measures which we think it will not do, that British influence will be materially affected by this unwise step; at a time too when Ireland is boiling over with indignation, and Chartism has so strong a foothold at home, we think it displays great weakness in that Government to bring upon them by an unwise enactment, the indignation of the principal Clergy of a once powerful and now dissatisfied nation.

To the Editor of the Neighbor.

Mr. Editor,—I learn from the last Neighbor, that Messrs. Wilson and Reynolds, who arrested Gen. Joseph Smith, for the purpose of transporting him to Missouri, not long since, near Dixon, Lee County, very deliberately took upon themselves the holy priesthood, and passed along as Mormon elders. And now let the people understand this, for by their hands you shall know them—Do men gather their grapes of thorns or figs of thistles? Like all true disciples who have followed their master, the people have a right to expect that these new disciples, "clothed with a little bit of authority," knowing that he that will not lay down his life in the cause may lose it, their reward; yes, honest men must say, that such pig-men of promise should sail their industry, like Peter in Rome, or Kogers in San Francisco, AS MAR- TYRS.

MARKETS.

Saint Louis, June 21st.

Tobacco.—The market for this article has been quite animated the last week, and sales have been sustained, if not exceeded, any previous period of the season. A fine article of tobacco particularly is in request, and commands fair prices. The sales at the Platters' Tobacco Warehouse amount to 320 bbls since our last Thursday report. We quote the particulars of the three last day's sales: 77 bbls Passed, viz: 13 bbls at $5.70; 7 do at $4.25 to $4.50; 19 do at $4 to $4.20; 7 do at $3.80 to $3.95; 7 do at $3.50 to $3.65; 10 do at $3.25 to $3.40; 7 do at $3.20 to $3.30; 2 do at $2.50 to $2.60; 52 bbls Refused viz: 2 bbls at $3.60; 7 do at $3 to $3.35; 5 do at $2.80 to $2.90; 3 do at $2.50 to $2.70; 11 do at $2 to $2.35; 15 do at $1.80 to $1.95; 8 do at $1.10 to $1.35. The receipts have been very liberal the last week. We will remark also, that a number of bbls have been sold at private sale at the inspectors', which have not been quoted above, many of which were of the best quality.

Flour.—The market since the date of our last review has been languid and unsteady, the price ranging from $1 to $1.50 for superfine. Yesterday sales on the levee to a limited extent were made at $4.25, and one superior lot at $1.50 for Nashville, Tennessee; but holders are generally firm at $1.50 to $1.75. The stock is accumulating in stores, as shippers are deterred from shipping by the unstable character of the New Orleans and Eastern markets, at the last dates.

Wheat.—At our last date the market was firm at 80 to 85 cents—since which the price has been fluctuating. Yesterday and to-day sales have been made at 75 to 80 cents for a prime article, at which figures the market is to crumble. The receipts have been very liberal during the week.

Corn and Oats.—There has been no material change in the market for these articles since our last. We quote sales of corn at 25 to 28 cents, sacks included; and at 20 cents exclusive of sacks. Oats are extremely dull at 15 to 16 cents, exclusive of sack. The demand for both is principally confined to the city. Corn in large lots in good shipping order, however, is occasionally sought after, and commands our highest figure.

Hypocisy.—A late German author has published some letters on Naples and the Neapolitans. He writes freely, especially on the monks, of whom after all, he cherishes many good opinions. He has preserved some amusing anecdotes of Rocco, an aged Dominican, who had great influence among the lazzaroni. Here are a couple of them:

One day he was preaching to a crowd in the public market place. "This day," he said, "I will see whether you truly repent you of your sins." Thereupon he commenced a penitential discourse that made the hair of the hardiest of multitude stand upright; and when they were all on their knees, gnashing their teeth, leaning their breasts, and putting on all imaginable signs of contrition, he suddenly cried, "Now you who truly repent of your sins, hold up your hands." The crowd was not a present who did not immediately stretch out both arms. "Holy Archangel Michael," then exclaimed Rocco, "thou, who with thy adamantine sword standest by the judgment seat of God, how me off every hand that has been raised hypocritically! Instantly every hand dropped; and Rocco poured forth a fresh invective against the sinfulness and perversity of his audience.

Rocco was once engaged in a dispute with a Spaniard, whom he alleged to be wearing that was not a single Spanish saint in heaven. The Spaniard was startled at so unexpected a declaration, but Rocco maintained it. "A few were in at first," he said, "but they smoked so many cigars, that the Madonna and other holy virgins were fairly sick; so St. Peter sent his wife to find out how he might rid them of such disagreeable guests. He sent a crier into every part of heaven to proclaim that a bull-fight was to be held outside of the gate. Thereupon every Spanish saint, without exception, ran off to see the show; and when they were all out, St. Peter banged the gate to, and took care never to let a Spaniard in again."

Young Mr. Rocco, in Boston, to promenade the streets with a lady, so that they are at all times prepared to make or defend a tu le.

NAUVOO SELECT SCHOOL.
MR. J. A. BANISTER, recently from New York, proposes opening a school, on Monday the 9th day of July, 1843, on the corner of Broadway and Parley streets, to be denominated the Nauvoo Select School, designed for the instruction of Youth in the following branches, viz. Reading, Writing, Spelling, Orthography, Geography, Arithmetic, Grammar, Composition, Oratory, and Philosophy. From his experience in teaching, Mr. B. feels confident that he can give general satisfaction to both scholars and parents.
The youth that to virtue and honor would rise, His time, books and talents most highly must prize.
It is therefore necessary that the first principle and rudiments of the English language should be, not only early but thoroughly inscribed in the mind of the young. Mr. B.'s plan, therefore, is, to suffer a scholar to proceed no farther in any branch of education than what he learns to perfection; so that what he does know, he knows sure. Try it and see.
Terms per quarter, For Reading, Writing, Grammar, Arithmetic, and Geography, with the lower branches, $2.50. Each quarter to consist of 12 weeks.

TRIAL OF JOSEPH SMITH.

Continued.

PARLEY P. PRATT, sworn. Says that he fully concurs in the testimony of the preceding witness, so far as he is acquainted with the same, and that Joseph Smith has not been known as Joseph Smith Junior, for the time stated by Hyrum Smith. He was an eye-witness of most of the scenes testified to by said Hyrum Smith, during the persecutions of our people in Missouri. That during the latter part of summer and fall of the year 1838, there were large bodies of the mob assembled in various places, for the avowed object of killing, driving, robbing, plundering and exterminating the Mormons, and actually committed many murders and other depredations, as related by the preceding witness. The Governor was frequently petitioned, as also the other authorities, for redress and protection. At length Austin A. King, the Judge of the Circuit Court of the Fifth Judicial District, ordered out somewhere near a thousand men for the avowed purpose of quelling the mob and protecting the Mormons. These being under arms for several weeks, did, in some measure, prevent the mob's proceedings; for some time, after which, Judge King withdrew the force, refusing to put the State to further expense, for our protection, without orders from the Governor. The mob then again collected in great numbers in Carroll, Davies, and Caldwell counties, and expressed their determination to drive the Mormons from the State or kill them. They did actually drive them from De Witt, firing upon them, and taking others prisoners. They turned a man by the name of Smith Humphrey and family out of doors, when sick, and plundered his house and burned it before his eyes. They also plundered the citizens generally, taking their lands, houses and property. Those whose lives were spared, were driven far West in the utmost distress and consternation. Some of them actually died on the way, through exposure, suffering and destitution. Other parties of the mob were plundering and burning houses in Davies county; and another party of the mob were ravaging the south part of Caldwell county, in a similar manner. The Governor was again and again petitioned for redress and protection, but utterly refused to render us any assistance whatever. Under these painful and distressing circumstances, we had the advice of General Atchison, Doniphan and Parks, to call out the Militia of Caldwell and Davies counties, which was mostly composed of Mormons, and to make a general defence. The presiding Judge of Caldwell county, Elsie Hughes, gave orders to the Sheriff of said county to call out the Militia. They were called out under the command of Colonel Hinkle, who held a commission from the Governor, and was the highest military officer in the county. This force efficiently dispersed the mob in several places, and a portion of them were organized in the city of Far West, that they could assemble themselves upon the shortest notice, and were frequently ordered to assemble in the public square of said city, in cases of emergency. These proceedings against the mobbing and persecutions by designing men, both to the Governor and other authorities and people of the State, caused great excitement against the Mormons. Many tried to have it understood that the Mormons were in open rebellion and making war upon the State. With this pretence, Governor Boggs issued the following exterminating orders:

HEAD QUARTERS OF THE MILITIA.

CITY OF JEFFERSON, Mo.

October 27th, 1838.

Since the order of the morning to you, directing you to come with four hundred mounted men, to be raised within your Division, I have received, by Amos Hays, Esq., and Wiley C. Williams, Esq., one of my aids, information of the most appalling character, which changes entirely the face of things, and places the Mormons in the attitude of an avowed defiance of the laws, and of having made war upon the people of the State. Your orders are therefore, to hasten your operations and endeavor to reach Richmond in Ray county, with all possible speed. The Mormons must be treated as enemies, and must be exterminated, or driven from the State, if necessary, by the public peace. Their outrages are beyond all description. If you can increase your force, you are authorized to do so, to any extent you may think necessary. I have just issued orders to Major General Wolk of Marion county, to raise five hundred men and to march them to the northern part of Davies county, and there to unite with General Doniphan of Clay—who has been ordered with five hundred men to proceed to the same point for the purpose of intercepting the retreat of the Mormons to the north. They have been directed to communicate with you by express. You can also communicate with them if you find it necessary. In case of proceeding as at first directed, to re-encircle immediately to Richmond, and there operate against the Mormons. Brigadier General Parks of Ray, has been ordered to have four hundred of his Brigade in readiness to join you at Richmond. The whole force will be placed under your command.

(Signed) L. W. BOGGS,

Governor and Commander-in-Chief.

In the mean time, Major General Lucas, and Brigadier General Wilson, both of Jackson county, (who had, five years previously, assisted in driving about twelve hundred Mormon citizens from that county, besides burning two hundred and three houses, and assisting in murdering several, and plundering the rest,) raised forces to the amount of several thousand men, and appeared before the city of Far West in battle array. A Tow of the Militia then paraded in front of the city, which caused the cowardly assistance to come to a halt at about a mile distant, in full view of the town. A messenger arrived from them and demanded three persons before they massacred the rest and laid the town in ashes. The names of the persons demanded were Adam Lightner, John C. Emerson and his wife. They gave no information who they were, but by what authority they came; neither had we at that time any knowledge of the Governor's order. In any of these movements, the mail having been designedly stopped by our enemies, for three weeks previously. We had supposed on their first appearance, that they were friendly troops sent for our protection; but on receiving this alarming information of their wicked intentions, we were much surprised, and sent a messenger with a white flag to enquire of them who they were, and what they wanted of us, and by whose authority they came. This flag was fired upon by Captain Bogard, the Methodist priest, who afterwards told me the same day, by his own mouth. After several attempts, however, we got an interview, by which we learned who they were, and that they pretended to have been sent by the Governor to exterminate our people. Upon learning this fact, no resistance was offered to their will or wishes. They demanded the arms of the Militia, and forcibly took them away. They requested that Mr. Joseph Smith and other leaders of the Church should come into their camp for consultation, giving them a sacred promise of protection and safe return. Accordingly, Joseph Smith, Sidney Rigdon, Lyman Wight, George W. Robinson and myself, started in company with Colonel Hinkle, to their camp, when we were soon abruptly met by General Lucas with seven hundred of his soldiers, in a hostile manner, who immediately surrounded us, and set up the most hideous yells that might have been expected to have proceeded from the mouths of demons, and marched us, as prisoners, to their lines. There we were detained for two days and nights, and had to sleep on the ground in the cold month of November, in the midst of rain and mud—were continually surrounded with a strong guard, whose mouths were filled with cursing and bitterness, blackguardism and blasphemy; who offered us every abuse and insult in their power, both by night and day; and many individuals shot at our heads, and fired their deadly aim at our heads. They related the circumstances in detail of having, the previous day, disarmed a certain man in his own house, and took him prisoner, and afterwards beat out his brains with his own gun in presence of their officers. They told of other individuals saying here and there in the brush, when they had shot down without resistance, and who were laying unburied, for the hogs to feed upon. They also named one or two individual females of our society, who they had forcibly seized, and were carrying off to be sold as slaves, committed rape upon. One of these was a daughter of a respectable family, with whom I have been long acquainted, and with whom I have since conversed, and learned that it was truly the case. Delicacy forbids my mentioning the names. I also heard several of the soldiers acknowledge and boast of having stolen money in one place, clothing and bedding in another, and horses in another, whilst on port, and beef, were taken by the whole army to support the men and horses; and in many cases, cattle, hogs and sheep were shot down, and only a small portion of them used, the rest left to waste. Of these crimes, of which the soldiers boasted, the general officers freely conversed, and boasted of the same. I heard General Doniphan, who professed to be opposed to such proceedings, acknowledge the truth of them, and give us several particulars in detail. I believe the name of the man whose brains they knocked out, was Carey; and another individual who had his chest broken open and several hundred dollars in specie taken out, was the same Smith Humphrey whose house the mob burned at De Witt.

After the Mormons were all disarmed, General Lucas gave them a compulsory order for men, women and children, to leave the State forthwith, without any exceptions—counting it a mercy to spare their lives on these conditions. Whilst these things were proceeding, one of the relatives of us from confinement, Hyrum Smith and Amasa Lyman were forcibly added to our number, as prisoners, and under a large military escort, accompanied by General Wilson, before mentioned, we were all marched to Jackson county, a distance of between fifty and sixty miles, leaving our families and our friends at their mercy, in a destitute condition, to prepare for a journey of more than two hundred miles, at the approach of winter, without our protection, and every moment exposed to robbery, ravishment, and other insults—our property robbed and their houses and lands already wrested from them.

We were exhibited like a caravan of wild animals on the way, and in the streets of Independence, and were a kept prisoners for a show for several days. In the mean time, a General Clark had been sent by Governor Boggs, with an additional force of six thousand men, from the lower country, to join General Lucas in his operations against the Mormons. He soon arrived before Far West with his army, and confirmed all Lucas had done, and highly commended them for their virtue, forbearance and other deeds in bringing about so peaceable and amicable an adjustment of affairs. He kept up the same scene of rage, plunder, ravishment and depredation, for the support and enrichment of his army—even burning the houses and fences for fuel. He also insisted that every man, woman and child of the Mormon society, should leave the State, except such as he detained as prisoners; stating that the Governor had sent him to exterminate them, but that he would, as a mercy, spare their lives, and give them until the first of April following, to get out of the State. He also compelled them, at the point of the bayonet, to sign a deed of renunciation of all their real estate, to defray the expenses of what he called "The Mormon War." After arranging all these matters to his satisfaction, he returned to Richmond, thirty miles distant, taking about sixty heads of families with him, and marching them through a severe snow storm, on foot, as prisoners, leaving their families in a perishing condition.

Having established his head-quarters at Richmond, Ray county, he sent to General Lucas and demanded us to be given up to him. We were accordingly transported some thirty or forty miles, delivered over to him, and put in close confinement, in chains, under a strong guard. At length we obtained an interview with him, and enquired why we were detained as prisoners. I said to him, Sir, we have now been prisoners under the most aggravating circumstances for two or three weeks, during which time we have received no information as to why we are prisoners, or for what object, as no writ has been served upon us. We are not detained by the civil law, and as ministers of the gospel in times of peace, who never bear arms, we cannot be considered prisoners of war, especially as there has been no war. And from present appearances, we can hardly be considered prisoners of hope. Why then these bonds? Said he, You were taken to be tried. Tried by what authority? said I. By court martial, replied

he. By court martial? said I. Yes, said he. How, says I, can men, who are not military men, but ministers of the gospel, be tried by court martial, in this country where every man has a right to be tried by a jury? He replied it was according to the treaty with General Lucas, on the part of the State of Missouri, and Colonel Hinkle, the commanding officer of the outposts of Far West, on the part of the Mormons, and in accordance with the Governor's order. And, said he, I approve of all that Lucas has done, and am determined to see it fulfilled. Said I, Colonel Hinkle was but a Colonel of the Caldwell county militia, and commissioned by the Governor, and the Mormons had no fortress, but were, in common with others, citizens of Missouri, and therefore we recognize no authority in Colonel Hinkle, to sell our liberties or make treaties for us.

Several days afterwards, General Clark again entered our prison and said he had concluded to deliver us over to the civil authorities. And, said he, I have been brought before Austin A. King, Judge of the Fifth circuit, where an examination was commenced, and witnesses sworn at the point of the bayonet, and threatened on pain of death if they did not swear to that which would suit the court. During this examination, I heard Judge King ask one of the witnesses, who was a Mormon, if he and his friends intended to live on their lands any longer than April, and to plant crops? Witness replied, why not? The Judge replied, If you once think to plant crops or to occupy your lands any longer than the first of April, the citizens will be upon you; they will kill every man, woman and child, and leave you to rot in the ground without a burial. They have been so carefully withheld from doing this on the present occasion, but will not be restrained for the future. On examining a Mormon witness for the purpose of substantiating the charge of treason against Mr. Smith, he questioned him concerning our religious faith:

First. Do the Mormons send missionaries to foreign nations? The witness answered in the affirmative.

Secondly. Do the Mormons believe a certain passage in the Book of Daniel naming the passage, which reads as follows: "And the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and his dominion is shall serve and obey him." Dan. vii. 27? On being answered in the affirmative, the judge ordered the scribe to put it down as a strong point for treason; but this was too much for even a Missouri lawyer to bear; he remonstrated against such a course of procedure, but in vain. Said he, judge you had better make the bible treason. After an examination of this kind, for many days, some were set at liberty, others admitted out on bail, and themselves and bail expelled from the state forthwith, with the rest of the Mormon citizens. And Joseph Smith, Hyrum Smith, Sidney Rigdon, Lyman Wight, and others were committed to the Clay county jail for further trial. Two or three others, amongst them, were put into the jail at Ray county, for the same purpose.

The Mormon people now began to leave the state, agreeably to the exterminating order of Governor Boggs. Ten or twelve thousand of them, during the winter, and fled to the state of Illinois. A small number of widows, and the poor, together with my family and some of the friends of the other prisoners, still lingered in Far West, when a small band of armed men entered the town and committed many depredations and threatened life, and swore if my wife and children and others whom they named were not out of the state, in as many days, they would kill them; as the time now drew near for the completion of the exterminating order of Governor Boggs. Accordingly, my wife and children, and others, left the state to seek safety, and to go to the state of Illinois, where to get, wandering to and fro, without a husband, father, or protector. Myself and family still remained in prison, after all the other Mormons had left the state; and even Mr. Smith and his party, had escaped to bring up the rear. In June, by change of venue, we were removed from Ray county, to Columbia, Boone county, upwards of one hundred miles towards the state of Illinois; and by our request a special court was called, for final trial; but notwithstanding we were removed more than one hundred miles from the scenes of their depredations, yet such was the fact, that neither our friends or witnesses dared come into the state to attend our trial, as they had been banished from the state by the governor's order of extermination.

The principal officers of the state, civil and military. On these grounds, and having had all these opportunities to know, I testify that neither Mr. Smith, nor any other Mormon has the least prospect for justice, or to receive a fair and impartial trial in the state of Missouri. If tried at all, they must be tried by authorities who have trampled all law under their feet, and who have assisted in committing murder, robbery, treason, arson, rape, burglary, and felony; and who have made a law of banishment, contrary to the laws of all nations; and executed this barbarous law with the utmost rigor and severity. Therefore, Mr. Smith, and the Mormons generally, have suffered the end of the law, of which they had no choice, and therefore, the state of Missouri has no further claims, whatever, upon any of them.

I furthermore testify that the authorities of other states, who would assist Missouri, to wreak further vengeance upon any individual of the persecuted Mormons, are either ignorantly or wilfully aiding and abetting in all these crimes.

Cross examined. He states that he was very intimate with Mr. Smith at the time he resided in the state of Missouri, and was with him almost daily, and that he knows positively that Mr. Smith held no office, either civil or military, either real or pretended, in that State; and that he never bore arms, or did military duty, nor even in self defence; but that he was a peaceable, law-abiding, and faithful citizen, and a preacher of the gospel, and exhorted the citizens to be peaceable, long suffering and slow to act, even in self defence. He further stated that there was no fortress in Far West, but a temporary fence, made of rails, house logs, floor planks, wagons, carts, &c., hastily thrown together, after being told by General Lucas that they were to be massacred the following morning, and the town burnt to ashes, without giving any information by what authority. And he further states that he only escaped himself from that state by walking out of the jail when the door was open to put in food, and came out in obedience to the governor's order of banishment, and to fulfil the same.

PARLEY P. PRATT.

[As we intend publishing the whole proceedings of the trial in pamphlet form, it will be impossible for us to conclude the testimony given in on that occasion, before next week.]

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP COLUMBIA.

16 DAYS LATER FROM ENGLAND.

The Royal Mail Steamer Columbia, Captain Miller, arrived at Boston on Sunday morning, the 18th, at 7 o'clock, bringing Liverpool papers to June 4th, and London papers to June 3d.

The news by this steamer is of considerable importance. All kinds of business was improving.

Among the passengers is the Rev. T. Sewall, bearer of despatches to our government.

Another conspiracy is said to have been discovered in the Turkish army, which had in view the dethronement of the Sultan and the placing of his brother on the throne.

The difficulties between Turkey and Persia are assuming a more beligerent aspect, and the mediation of the European governments is seriously talked of.

The Russians appear to have made no further progress in the subjugation of Circassia.

The trade of Paisly continues to improve and the display of shawls this season is unprecedented.

In consequence of the increased demand for goods, several of the cotton manufacturers of Blackburn have recently increased the wages of their weavers generally to the amount of 10 per cent.

The Court Circular contains a long account of the christening of the infant Princess on the 2nd inst.

The ceremony of churching the Queen took place at 12 o'clock on Friday week, in the chapel royal, Buckingham Palace.

It is now ascertained that defalcations of Mr. Sparham, late Secretary to the master of the Horse, who has absconded, amount to upwards of £8,000.

A person named Hurel was found guilty in London a few days back, of defrauding the customs. He was fined £4,500, which he has since paid.

Extended Failure.—A flat of bankruptcy has been opened against Messrs. John and George Clarke, of Market Harborough, and of Ropemaker street, London, extensive carpet and rug manufacturers. The failure of this house is said to be the cause of the failure of the Margaret Harbrough bank. The debts and liabilities of the bank are stated £200,000, and the available assets about £140,000.

Inda.—The India mail has arrived, on the 2d of May—from China to the 12th of March.

The death of the Commissioner Elopoo was the only news at Canton, but fresh attacks were expected on the Factories.

On Major Molcom's arrival, Sir H. Pottinger was to go to Canton with the ratification of the Treaty.

The affairs of Sicily were tranquil, though some troubles had taken place at Sirhand, and a serious engagement had been fought in Rhytil.

Ireland.—The repeal movement in Ireland has arrived at a crisis at once fearful and sublime. O'Connell occupies a most critical position, and whether he will prove competent to guide the important undertaking which he has been principally instrumental in bringing about, remains to be seen. We copy largely of these matters as we consider them fraught with the fate of unhappy Ireland.

The Repeal movement absorbs the attention exclusively at the present moment of the British ministry and the British people. It is making the most gigantic strides, the country is in a fearful state of excitement, and Mr. O'Connell, after visiting Cork and various parts of Ireland, has returned to Dublin. During his sojourn in the provinces, hundreds of thousands of his countrymen congregated at his back, and his progress resembled a continuous ovation from his out until his return.

He addressed them, on every occasion, in the most inflammatory strain, complimentary of the British connexion. The great bulk of the Catholic clergy have thrown themselves headlong into the movement; the rents comes pouring in by thousands of pounds per week, and all classes seem to regard a crisis at hand.

There is no middle course. Troops are daily pouring into the country. Government steamers are engaged between the tower of London and the prison house, Dublin, in carrying and landing arms, the castle in the latter city is being placed in a state of defence, and everything shows that the government anticipates an immediate outbreak.

Scotland, too, has been the scene of religious movement, the most important in its consequences, the most extended in its ramifications, which has taken place since the reformation. Nearly 500 ministers—the heart's blood of the Church, embracing all that are most distinguished for learning, talent and energy, have seceded from the Kirk, and thrown themselves upon the voluntary principle, rather than submit to an interference in matters of discipline with the civil power.

At the Dublin Corn Exchange, on Monday as a set-off against the supersecesses issued by the Chancellor, ten barristers headed by Sir Coleman O'Loghlen, son of the rolls, subscribed to the funds of the Repeal Association, and were by acclamation admitted as members. This demonstration caused a great sensation. O'Connell read for the meeting, the correspondence with the Chancellor, which preceded his dismissal from the magisterial bench. O'Connell has announced to Sir Edward Sugden his determination to impeach him thereupon, in the Irish parliament. The rent for the week was £2,225.

The late Irish papers contain an account of a melee between a party of Orangemen and a body of Repealers, at Duhannon, on the 30th of May. A house was razed, and many persons beaten, but no lives lost.

All the Irish forts, castles and battlements have been inspected by a government engineer, and ordered to be repaired and placed in a state of perfect utility. Indeed the preparations of government are such as would indicate that a civil war is not far distant.

The repeal affair in Cork was very brilliant. It is said that upwards of 500,000 persons were congregated on this occasion.

The procession alone occupied exactly 3 hours and five minutes in passing the Liberator's carriage, from the higher to the lower road, when tremendous cheers were given for the Liberator. When the procession passed, the roads throughout were lined with horsemen, cars and carriages; the fields and heights were occupied by countless thousands, whose enthusiastic shouts rent the air, the Liberator echoing them by cries of "Repeal! 'Old Ireland!'"

Would that the 'Iron Duke' or Sir Robert Peel had beheld the sight, which no language at our command can possibly give the most distant conception of. One of the most cheering circumstances that, as far as the trades were concerned, it brought together persons of all politics and persuasions, to join in the thrilling cry for Ireland's nationality.

The carriages then followed, with a train of cars, divisions of equestrians, &c., which occupied several miles of the road.

At Glanmire the window frames were all removed. Well dressed women occupied the windows, and cheered and waved handkerchiefs to the procession passed. The procession reached the Clamhor of Commerce at 7 o'clock.

Notwithstanding the absence of Mr. O'Connell in the country, where he has been attending various meetings, the Corn Exchange, Dublin, at the weekly meeting on the 23d ult. was densely crowded, and there was fully as much excitement as at any previous meeting. The amount of "Repeal rent" was the largest weekly return yet announced, having £1,100 18s. 6d. This included several English returns and £1,133 from Clones, County Monaghan, where the meeting of the Repealers was recently interrupted by the Orange party, and a poor man named Mc Caffry was murdered. The meeting did not terminate until near six, but the large room was crowded to the close.

Military Position in Ireland. The batteries have unexpectedly been reinforced by four additional pieces of artillery, and an additional force of one officer and fifteen men is expected daily. Letters have been received inquiring how many men all the forts would contain; all the guns are to be mounted without delay.

A man-of-war steamer went up the Shannon on Friday week, with two thousand stand of arms for Limrick. Four other steamers were despatched from the Tower for Ireland with arms. We understand that two men of war steamers will be stationed in the Shannon—one at Torbert, and the other at Cris Island.

The troops stationed in Ireland will amount, in June, to 25,000 men.

Almost every door in the city has chalked upon it, "Repeal or Blood!"—Cork Constitution.

Mr. O'Connell will not leave Ireland to attend to his parliamentary duties before the 10th of June.

The principle topic of interest since the sailing of the Acadia is the condition of Ireland, which is avowedly critical. The Repeal agitation has convulsed it from north to south. In his frantic rage, the privileged Agitator has commenced the campaign in business-like style, and in good earnest.—One Dr. Higgins, the Roman Bishop of Armagh, declares that all the Roman Bishops are Repealers. This assertion Dr. Murray, the Roman Archbishop of Dublin denies, in a letter which does not contain one sentence condemnatory of the Repeal movement.

Picked troops and arm of steamers, are being despatched to Ireland without stint or measure. That some movement is projected by the Agitator's party appears probable; that a fierce and formidable check is intended to be opposed to them no one can doubt.

The accounts which the next mail will take out will be startling and important. For the present it is perhaps enough to quote the rumour that many of the regiments located in Ireland are in favor of Repeal; indeed we are told that the regiment of which Lord Charles Wellesley, the Duke's son, is Lieutenant Colonel, are pledged to support Repeal.

The Lord Chancellor of Ireland (Sir Edward Sugden) has thought fit, and with the entire concurrence of the Ministry, to displace from the magistracy certain gentlemen; because they had either attended at or presided over Repeal meetings. The first person thus assailed was Lord French, and among a list of the exiles is included the name of Daniel O'Connell. A fiery and angry discussion in the house of Lords did but result from the Lord Chancellor that his learned colleague was justified in the expulsion he had risked; and after an impotent attempt on the part of Lord Campbell to bolster up an opposition to the measures of his successor.—[Wilmer's American News-Letter.

Spain.—Important events have occurred since the sailing of the last steamer on the 12th ult., beginning with the formation of the new cabinet under Lopez, and ending with its dissolution and that of the Cortes.

Two ministers have fallen in Spain since the meeting of the Cortes—that of Rodet, and that of Lopez.

The chamber of Deputies presented a stormy scene on the 20th. When M. M. Gomez Bucorra and Hoya left the palace they were assailed with cries of "Furor! Furor! Down with the Ministers and the Aynuchos! Liberty forever!"

An ill-looking individual was arrested in the crowd, armed with a knife, and vociferating cries of "Death against the new President and Council." The windows of M. Mendizabel's carriage were broken with stones during the day, and he deemed it prudent to repair to the legislative palace.

The Smyrna Journal of the 28th ult. mentions that a fire broke out at Magnesia on the 20th, which consumed 2000 shops of the grand bazaar. Most of the goods were saved, but the losses were nevertheless estimated at several millions of piastres.

Hungary.—The Hungarian journals announce that the election for the Committee of Marmara has given rise to a sanguinary riot. A cry of fire was raised, the tocsin of war was sounded, and stones thrown. The Deputies divided into two parties, the Wallachians and Magyars attacked each other and the latter were obliged to fly. The troops were called out, and the inhabitants, incensed with the nobility, who had fired several houses, joined the military, who had barricaded themselves, and threw stones upon the soldiers, wounding many. The troops then attacked the nobility and compelled them to retreat out of town. More than 200 persons were wounded, but the number killed had not been ascertained.

The Thames Tunnel.—This stupendous work is finished, and Wapping has reason to be proud of such a truly warring undertaking. Perhaps no enterprise ever had so much cold water thrown upon it and never was there a project which it seemed at one time so difficult to go through with. The engineer has worked like a horse, and has scarcely ever been out of the shaft. The original shareholders, whose pockets were well drained in fruitless efforts to drain the tunnel, have now the satisfaction of once more running through their property. For some time the ardor of the projectors was damped by the works going on too swimmingly. When accidents were every day occurrences, the Tunnel was a matter of interest; but, since the water has been effectually kept out, it has become a dry subject. On more than one occasion the Company would have been swamped, in spite of all hands being put to the pumps, if Government had not lent them their sucker. The funds, in fact, were at low water mark before the works reached the same desirable point; and the more the Tunnel was set afloat, the more were the shareholders aground in their undertaking.—But the perils are now past, and the Tunnel remains as a monument to British enterprise. We should call it perhaps, a pillar to the fame of the engineer, if it were not that a pillar is not complete without two things, one of which, the shaft, has been taken away, while the projectors have long since lost sight of the capital.—London Comic Almanack for 1843.

ARRIVAL OF THE GREAT WESTERN.

Thirteen days later from Europe.

The Great Western arrived at New York on the 1st of July, with dates from Liverpool to the 17th, and London to the 18th.

An individual named Samuel Mayres had been arrested in consequence of his addressing a letter to a member of the government, offering to assassinate Daniel O'Connell. He stated that he wrote the letter after dinner, under the influence of wine, and did not intend to send it.

The Repeal Association of Dublin has declined to have any connexion with, or assistance from, the London Chartist or Fearegus O'Conner, who tendered their services to them.

All idea of her Majesty's visit to Ireland is for the present abandoned.

The Austrian Government has concluded a loan with M. de Rothschild of $50,000,000, to be applied to the construction of rail roads.

ed. When we reached the brow of the hill, we received a salute from a gun there stationed, and proceeded on to the grove, where we were welcomed in a cordial and happy manner by the prophet and his people. The large concourse of people assembled to celebrate the day which gave birth to American Independence, convinced me that the Mormons have been most grossly slandered, and that they respect, cherish and love the free institutions of our country, and appreciate the sacrifices and bloodshed of those patriots who established them. I never saw a more orderly, gentlemanly, and hospitable people than the Mormons, nor a more enterprising population, as the stirring appearance of their city indicates. Nauvoo is destined to be under the influence and enterprise of such citizens as it now contains, and her natural advantages—a populous, wealthy and manufacturing city.

The services of the day were opened with a chaste and appropriate prayer, by an elder whose name I do not know, which was followed by rich strains of vocal and instrumental music; then followed the oration, which was an elegant, eloquent and pathetic one, as much so as I ever heard on a similar occasion. We started home about six o'clock, all evidently much pleased with Nauvoo, and gratified by their kind reception by her citizens.

A CITIZEN OF QUINCY.

The presents which have been sent to Queen Victoria from the Emperor of China, consist of golden bedsteads, and a great quantity of silk of a sort which has never yet been seen in Europe. There were likewise two ear-drops, worth a thousand pounds each; and a shawl, worked in needle work, with every kind of beast upon it known to the Chinese; besides 14 large cases, each weighing 14 cwt., and a small box of jewelry.

There is a war brewing between Ireland and England, which will yet terminate in their separation. Victoria visits Ireland in July. Her visit will most probably bring on a crisis. Success to Ireland.

Peter's wife's Mother.—A Clerical gentleman, remarkable for preaching many Sundays from one text, had nearly run through the year from these words: Peter's wife's mother lay sick of a fever. The church bell tolled one morning earlier than usual. The minister despatched a servant to enquire who was dead. The sexton pretended real ignorance but returned for answer: "that he believed it was Peter's wife's mother as she had been sick for a long time."

Plowing for Corn. The American Farmer says: In plowing up corn and oats ground, the farmer should neither spare his team or his plow, as the deeper he goes the better prepared will his soil be to sustain the crop sown upon it. It is a fact that cannot be disputed, that corn planted upon ground deeply plowed, always stands draught better, looks green and healthy longer, and nine times out of ten will yield more fodder and more grain, than that which is planted in shallow plowed ground. There is no mystery as to the reason; it is as obvious as two and two make four. The roots penetrate beyond the depth at which, by evaporation, the earth becomes deprived of its moisture, and there find in store for them that necessary ingredient to heartful vegetation, and thus escape the evil of being parched up for the want of water.

Warmth in feeding Cattle. A late English paper states that at the Chithero agricultural meeting, a communication was read from Professor Playfair, which contained the following facts worthy of every farmer in a cold climate: Heat is an equivalent for food, and by a knowledge of this fact, we may economize the latter very considerably. We know that cattle fatten much more slowly in winter than in summer, the reason being that part of the food is expended in the production of the necessary heat. Lord Duice was kind enough to communicate to me an experiment of his, in which there was one hundred sheep in the open air, and another hundred in the same space with sheds to retire into at pleasure. The first lot ate 25 pounds of Swedes (turnips) per day; the latter only 20 pounds; but the lot with five pounds a day less had gained on an average two pounds per sheep more than the other, at the conclusion of the experiment."

"Send a boy for the cows, but see to the milking yourself," is a saying most farmers understand. A cow that is not thoroughly and properly milked, will soon fall off in the quantity which she gives when treated right.

Theory of Marriage.—There was a merry fellow who supplied with Pluto three thousand years ago, and the conversation turned upon love and the choice of wives. He said, "he had learned from a very early tradition, that man was created male and female, with a duplicate set of limbs, and performed his locomotive functions with a kind of rotary movement as a wheel; that he became in consequence so excessively insolent that Jupiter, indignant, split him in two; and since that time each runs about the world in quest of his other half; if the two congenial halves meet, they are a very loving couple; otherwise, they are subject to a miserable, scolding, peevish and uncongenial matrimony." The search," he said, "was rendered difficult, for the reason that one man alighted upon a half that did not belong to him, another did necessarily the same, till the whole affair was thrown into irretrievable confusion."

Mourning.—In Europe, black is generally used because it represents darkness, unto which death is like as a privation of life. In China, white is used because they hope the dead are in Heaven, the place of purity. In Egypt yellow is used, because it represents the decaying of trees and flowers which become yellow as they die away. In Ethiopia brown is used, because it denotes the color of the earth from whence we came, and to which we return. In some parts of Turkey blue is used because it represents the sky, where they hope the dead are gone; but in other parts purple and violet because being a mixture of black and blue, it represents as it were sorrow on one side, and hope on the other.

"A day after the fair," as Mr. Day said when he went a courting.

A man's best or worst fortune is his wife. Beware how you choose her.

Caulking Vessels Tightly.—A new substance has been invented in England, for caulking the seams of vessels. It is made of India rubber and shalac, dissolved in naphtha. It is neither an expensive article, nor difficult to prepare. The material is so prodigiously adhesive, that the Lords Commissioners of the admiralty have found, by experiment, that when once united by it, the plank will part any where sooner than where the two were joined together.

Positive cure for Corns.—A man in Massachusetts, who had long been afflicted with corns upon two of his toes, went into a joiner's shop, took a mallet and chisel, and deliberately severed the two toes from the foot. He bound them up and they soon got well, and he declares he is highly satisfied with his experiment.

NO CHANCE FOR LAWYERS OUT WEST.

The Cleveland Herald, commenting upon a statement in the New York American that there are over one thousand lawyers in the Commercial Metropolis, and that the great falling off in business will cause a vast many to seek a new field for their talents in the western states, says:

"Such as come to the west for a 'new field' had better bury their legal 'talents' in a knapsack and take to the axe, the plough and the spade. We have a great country out this way, but people are getting too sensible and industrious to give lawyers for pickings much longer. True, when the west was young, the settlers from all parts of creation had to indulge in an occasional knock down and drag out just to form acquaintance with each other, and not unfrequently sue and be sued, by way of cementing family friendship. Lawyers found the field of course, for Jove's bird cannot spy a fair oil carcass more readily than the keen lawyers sniff a suit. They stuck up their shingles at every county seat and village from the Alleghenies to the Rocky Mountains, and that the race might not become extinct, they 'took in' as students at law such young gentlemen of brilliant genius as were troubled with the 'spring fever,' and found digging in Blackstone more congenial to their tastes than digging in black muck. As most of the old lawyers still practice successfully, and flocks of young limbs sledge at every session of the Supreme Court, the 'one thousand' in New York will see that 'a vast many' will be quick to many to flourish in the Western States."

THE LADY AND THE COBLER.

Some years ago the husband of an old lady residing in a country village, happened to die rather suddenly without a will, for the want of which very necessary precaution, his estate would have passed away from the widow, had she not resorted to the following remarkable expedient to avert the loss of her property: Concerning the death of her husband, she prevailed upon an old cobbler, her neighbor, who was in person some what like the deceased, to go to bed at her house and personate him, in which character it was agreed that he should dictate a will, leaving the widow the estate in question. An attorney was accordingly sent for to prepare the required document, and the widow, on his arrival, appeared to be realizing the greatest affliction at her good man's danger, but forthwith proceeded to ask questions of her pretended husband, calculated to elicit the answer she expected and desired. The cobbler groaned aloud, and looking as much like a person going to give up the ghost as possible, he replied:

"I intend to leave you half my estate; and I do think the poor old shoemaker who lives over the way, is deserving the other half, for he has always been a good neighbor."

The widow was thunderstruck at receiving a reply so different from that which she expected, but dared not negative the cobbler's will, for fear of losing the whole of the property, while the cunning old rogue in bed, who was himself the poor old shoemaker living over the way, laughed heartily in his sleeve, and divided with her the fruits of a project which the widow had intended for her sole benefit.

THE HEAVENS DEGENEROTYPED.

The annexed extract of a letter from Francis B. Ogden Esq., U. S. consul at Bristol, was read by Mr. Dayton, before the National Institute at its meeting on Monday last.

"You ask if any thing has been recently discovered in relation to the Deguerotype. I will not attempt to give you the particulars. It appears that at the observatory in Rome they have succeeded so well in combining the powers of the telescope and the daguerreotype as to produce a perfect map of the heavens. The nebulous clouds are transferred to a sheet of paper, every shadow as distinct as seen through the best instrument, the precise position of Jupiter and his moons given at any moment of time and all the phases of the other planets with the greatest accuracy. My friend Mr. Taylor, has promised me a sight of some of the pictures which he says are on a scale that would require a globe of the size the cupola of St. Paul's to place them in proportion."—N. Y. Mechanic.

AN IRRUPTION OF LOCUSTS.

Livingston, June 25th, 1843.

The locusts are on us: and I hasten to apprise you of the movements of the invading army. The few which were observed on Monday the 29th ult, probably perished by the unseasonable cold of the few succeeding days, and the main body presently kept in doors till on Saturday, June 3d, a Southwest wind having brought us a warmer atmosphere, they began to feel the necessity laid upon them to visit this upper world, and make provision for continuing their race and name to future ages. About sundown on that day, while looking after the safety of a newly hived swarm of bees, I first noticed several grubs crawling round the hive, and on closer examination I discovered countless numbers ascending from the subterranean abodes, and crawling over fences, bushes, and whatever promised to offer a secure resting place for the last transformation. I even found at that early hour some already escaped from the shell, and with wings fully expanded, and others half extricated.

My observations fully confirmed the account given by your Fairfield correspondent. I think he omitted to say that when first extricated from the shell they are of a cream color, except the eyes and two dark spots on the back part of the head. They soon become brown. The W is fully marked on their wings, (that is, on the two outer and much longer, for they have four). It probably means Washingtonian, for those insects are the most abstemious of their kind.

On Sunday the bushes were alive with them. As yet they fly feebly, and often become a prey to ducks, hens and pigs, which devour them with high gusto. I even induced my dog Watch to a dozen with apparent relish. Some cats also feed on them.

Perhaps some of your readers, misled, as I was once, by the name, confused these abominable visitors with the locusts of Asia and Africa, whose ravages have devastated kingdoms, and who move from country to country in armies more numerous than the pigeons even are in our western world, or the rats in Lapland. They may be assured that our locusts agree with those formidable invaders in nothing but the name. The African locusts are of the grasshopper family. Captain Riley informs us that his shipwrecked crew, when they first saw these insects on the coast of Barbary, took them for large grasshoppers.

I am no etymologist, and even have no entomological work at hand, but have understood our locusts are of the sticticus family, another species of which Byron mentions in Italy.

A DOLLAR A DAY, AND FOUND.

A gentleman who resides in the vicinity of the city, and whose early mornings are devoted to the culture of a large garden which is attached to his house, finding himself somewhat behind-hand in his horticultural department this Spring, procured a tidy-looking Irishman, who was passing his gate one morning, with the inquiry if he 'would like a job?' 'Sure, sir, and it's that same I'm looking after,' said Paddy, in a rich brogue, which won upon the heart of him by whom he was addressed, and who immediately replied, 'I shall want you four days—what wages do you ask for?' 'Why, sir,' returned the son of Erin, 'as I live a good bit away from this, and my going home for males will bother my day's work, while an extra mouth at yer honor's kitchen table is nothing at all, I'll just find me for a dollar a day, and you shall come!'

This was agreed to; and as Pat had his rent to pay next day, and wanted something for the children, the gentleman paid him four dollars on the spot, and the work was to be commenced the next day. The next day, however, and the next, and then the whole four days passed by, and Pat was not to be seen at the garden or the gate!

It might have been a month after the occurrence above related took place, when 'the parties meeting by accident in the street, Pat was accosted by his former employer, in an angry tone, with—

'Well, sir, and why the devil did you not come to work for me, according to agreement?'

'Shure, sir,' said the Irishman, (with a twitch at the rim of his well-worn tile), 'it's meself that was ready to do my part of the bargain; but yer honor's at fault this time, any how.'

'And pray how?' said the other.

'It's yerself 'll not deny yer honor agreed to give me a dollar a day and find me!'

'And didn't I give you a dollar a day, and pay you before-hand, too?'

'Thure for you; yer honor did that same; ye did give me the dollar a day—but ye didn't find me!'

'Find you, you scoundrell! I ransacked every street in town; but where the devil were you?'

'Shooting at Muddy Pond Woods, yer honor!'

The gentleman gave Pat a dollar, and told him to call at the garden when he wanted work—but to be sure to find himself.—Boston Post.

To the Editor of the Neighbor.

blasphemous, and cruel, as well as illegal attempt to transfer Gen. Joseph Smith to Missouri. Any parade about Reynolds's character, can be settled in an instant. He boasted while in Illinois that he murdered David W. Patton, on Crooked Creek in 1838; so that if murder makes a character, Reynolds has it, by confession and reputation, and it can be had by proof if necessary.

Since Hogg's exterminating order went forth, "Conquering and to conquer."

It would puzzle a Jesuit to find an officer in that state, civil, military, or ecclesiastical, that is not guilty of murder, arson, treason, plundering, larceny, bribery or other vice; for the whole state has a hand in that unhallowed tragedy. There is not an honest man in the world, acquainted with the facts, but knows that Missouri is forever disgraced as a state, and stands branded on our national escutcheon, as a band of outlaws and criminals. And when the editor of the Old School Democrat undertakes to cry 'gentleman of intelligence and integrity all we can say, is, "the partaker is as bad as the thief." If the editor of the Old School Democrat did not assist in burning a negro alive, in 1838, in St. Louis, it might have been for the reason, that he was engaged in a less conspicuous job in the gutter! SAUL among the Prophets.

St. Louis, July 11, 1843.

A PUBLIC MEETING IN RELATION TO THE LATE ARREST OF GENERAL JOSEPH SMITH.

Nauvoo, Ill., July 1st, 1843.

At a meeting of the citizens of Nauvoo, held this day in the Mayor's office, it was Resolved unanimously, that Messrs. Sanger and Dixon, of the town of Dixon, and the citizens of Dixon, Pawpaw Grove, and Lee County generally, in this State, receive the warmest thanks of this meeting for their firm patriotism, bold and decided stand taken against lawless outrage, and the spirit of mobocracy, as manifested in the arrest or capture of General Joseph Smith, while on a visit to his friends in that district of country by "Harmful T. Wilson and Joseph H. Reynolds," pretending to act under the authority of a writ obtained from the Governor of this State, given in consequence of a pretended requisition made on him from the executive of Missouri, for the arrest and delivery of said Joseph Smith unto the authorities of Missouri. In maintaining the legal rights of persons thus arrested, and seeing the laws of Illinois maintained, and the full benefit of them enjoyed by every citizen of said State, they have shown themselves republicans, patriots, and worthy citizens of this State; and have entitled themselves, not only to the thanks of this meeting, but to that of all lovers of law and good order. With such citizens as these, Illinois will long enjoy the benefit of good order, and the blessings of a free people.

Resolved unanimously, That the foregoing resolution be published in the newspapers.

SIDNEY RIGDON, Moderator.

WILLARD RICHARDS, Clerk.

MESMERETIC IDIOTS.

MESMERISM.—Dr. Collyer gives the following important cautions to those who wish to examine this subject practically:

Never allow yourself to be mesmerized by a person not in perfect health.

Never allow yourself to be acted on by a person inferior in his mental powers.

Never allow a rough, uncouth person to act on you—he will frequently induce nervous diseases the most difficult to cure.

Never allow a stranger, especially one of the opposite sex, to mesmerize you.

Never allow yourself to be acted on by more than one mesmeriser.

Never remain in the mesmeric condition more than thirty minutes.

By all means never allow your brain to be tampered with by ignorant mesmerisers; in an evil hour they may render you idiotic for life.

HAVE I PAID THE PRINTER?
When the cold storm howls round the door
And you by light of taper,
Sit clearly by the evening fire,
Enjoying the last paper—
Just think of him whose work 't has helped
To wear away the winter,
And put this query to yourself—
Have I paid the Printer?

From east and west!—from north and south,
From lands beyond the water,
He weekly brings you "lots of news"
From every nook and quarter.
No slave on earth toils more than he,
Through summer's heat and winter,
How can you for a moment then,
Neglect to pay the Printer?

Your other bills you promptly pay,
Wherever you do go, sir—
The butcher for his meat is paid,
For "groceries" in the grocery;
The tailor and the shoemaker,
The hatter and the wine-mer,
All get their pay—then why neglect
To settle with the Printer?

BANISTER, recently from New York, proposes opening a school, on Monday the 9th day of July, 1843, on the corner of Broadway and Parley streets, to be denominated the Nauvoo Select School, designed for the instruction of Youth in the following branches, viz. From his experience in teaching, Mr. B. feels confident that he can give general satisfaction to both scholar and parents.

The youth that to virtue and honor would rise,
His time, books and talents most highly must prize.
It is therefore necessary that the first principle and rudiments of the English language should be, not only early but thoroughly inscribed in the mind of the young. Mr. B.'s plan, therefore, is, to suffer a scholar to proceed no farther in any branch of education than what he learns to perfection; so that what he does know, he knows sure. Try it and see.

POETRY.

The Kidnapping of Gen. Joseph Smith, on the 22d of June, by Hiram, the Sheriff of Jackson County, Mo., and Wilson, of Carthage, Hancock Co. Ill.

BY MISS E. B. SNOW

Like bloodhounds freely prowling,
With pistols ready drawn,
With snuff-boxes and cigars,
Those kidnappers came on.

He bared his breast before them,
But axed they hurried near,
A fearful scene of crime—
It was the coward's fear.

Will night their dark souls wither
When their courage dard?
They say, "O, what a scene!"
Warmth has been banished!

"Death has no terrors,"
He said, "I have a life
So subject to the horrors
Of your ungodly strife."

"What means your savage conduct?"
Have you a lawful right?
To any legal process,
I cheerfully submit."

"Here," said these lawless ruffians,
"is our authority;
And draw their pistols nearer
In rude territory."

With more than savage wildness—
Like hungry beasts of prey;
They bore, in all his madness,
The man of God away!

With brush-haste they tore him
From his bed of repose,
And far away they bore him,
With scarce the word, "Farewell!"

Their hearts are seats where bloodness
Over foul corruption reigns—
The milk of human kindness,
Flows not within their veins.

Their conduct was unworthy
The meekness of a man,
'T would better fit the tiger
Emerging from its den!

Missouri, O, Missouri!
You thus prolong your shame
By sending such as Reynolds Abroad to bear your name.

Could Jackson County furnish
No lambs more than she?
Must legal office burnish
Such wild barbarity?

Go search the roughest forests,
The panther and the bear,
As well would grace your suffrage—
As well deserve a share.

Then might the heartless Wilson,
Tyrant of the bloodless clan,
Become a confidant with them,
And teach them to destroy.

So much ferocious nature
Should join the brutal clan,
And not disgrace the virtues
That claim to be a man.

But hear, O, Missouri!
Once more, the prophet's free—
Your ill-directed fury
Brings forth a jubilee!

TRIAL OF JOSEPH SMITH.

Continued.

GEORGE W. PITKIN sworn. Says that he consults with the preceding witnesses H. Smith and P. P. Pratt, in all the facts with which he was acquainted, that in the summer of 1838 he was elected Sheriff of the county of Caldwell, and State of Missouri. That in the fall of the same year while the County was threatened and infested with mobs, he received an order from Judge Higbee, the presiding Judge of said County, to call out the militia and he executed the same. The said order was presented by Joseph Smith, Sen. who showed the witness a letter from General Atchison giving such advice as was necessary for the protection of the citizens of said county; reports of the mobs destroying property were daily received. Thus no knowledge that Joseph Smith was concerned in organizing or commanding said militia in any capacity whatever. About this time he received information that about forty or fifty "Vaguer-Rifles" and a quantity of ammunition were being conveyed through Caldwell to Davies County for the use of the mob: Upon which he deputized William Allred to go with a company of men and to intercept them if possible, he did so and brought the said arms and ammunition into Far West which were afterwards delivered up to the order of Austin A. King, judge of the fifth circuit in Missouri.

It was generally understood at that time that said arms had been stolen by Neil Gillum, and his company of volunteers, who had been upon a six months tour of service in the war between the United States and the Florida Indians, they were supposed to have been taken from the Fort at Tampa Bay, and brought to Richmond Clay County and that Captain Pollard or some other person loaned them to the mob.
He further says that whilst in office as sheriff he was forcibly and illegally compelled by Lieutenant Cook, the son in law or brother in law of Bogard, the Methodist Priest—to start for Richmond and when he demanded of him by what authority he acted he was shown a Bowie knife and a brace of pistols—And when he asked what he wanted of him he said they would let him know when he got to Richmond.
Many of the citizens of Caldwell County were taken in the same manner without any legal process whatever and thrust into prison.

GEORGE W. PITKIN.

BRIGHAM YOUNG sworn. Says that, so far as he was acquainted with the facts stated by the previous witnesses, he concurs with them, and that he accompanied Mr. Joseph Smith into the State of Missouri, and arrived at Far West on the 14th day of March, 1838, and was neighbor to Mrs. Smith until he was taken by Governor Boggs' militia, a prisoner of war, as they said, and that he was knowing to his character whilst he was in the State of Missouri; and that he, Mr. Smith, was in no way connected with the militia of that State: neither did he bear arms at all, nor give advice, but was a peaceable, law-abiding, good citizen, and a true republican in every sense of the word. He was with Mr. Smith a great share of the time, until driven out of Missouri by an armed force, under the exterminating order of Governor Boggs. He heard the most of Mr. Smith's public addresses, and never did he hear him give advice or encourage anything contrary to the laws of the State of Missouri; but to the contrary, always instructing the people to be peaceable, quiet, and law-abiding, and if necessity should compel them to withstand their enemies, by whom they were daily threatened in mobs

at various points, that they, the Mormons, should attend to their business strictly, and not regard reports; and if the mob did come upon them, to contend with them by the strong arm of the law; and if that should fail, on only refuge would be self defence: and be sure and act only upon the defensive. And there were no operations against the mob by the militia of Caldwell county only by the advice of Generals
Atchison, Doniphan, and Parks.

At the time that the army came in sight of Far West, he observed their approach, and thought some of the militia of the State had come to the relief of the citizens; but to his great surprise, he found that they were come to strengthen the hands of the mobs that were around us, and which immediately joined the army. A part of these mobs were painted like Indians, and "Gillum," their leader, was also painted in a similar manner, and styled himself the "DELAWARE CHIEF," and afterwards he,
and the rest of the mob, claimed and obtained pay, as militia, from the State, for all the time they were engaged as mob, as will be seen by reference to the acts of the Legislature. That there were Mormon citizens wounded and murdered by the army under the command of General Lucas, and he verily believes that several women were ravished to death by the soldiers of Lucas and Clark. He also stated that he saw Joseph Smith, Sidney Rigdon, Parley
P. Pratt, Lyman Wight, and George W. Robinson, delivered up by Colonel Hinkle to General Lucas, but expected they would have returned to the city that evening or the next morning, according to agreement, and the pledge of the sacred honor of the officers that they should be allowed to do so: but they did not return at all. The next morning, General Lucas demanded and took away the arms of the Militia of Caldwell county, (which arms have never been returned,) assuring them that they should be protected; but so soon as they obtained possession of the arms, they commenced their ravages by plundering the citizens of their bedding, clothing, money, wearing apparel, and everything of value they could lay their hands upon;
and also attempting to violate the chastity of the women in sight of their husbands and friends—under the pretence of hunting for prisoners and arms. The soldiers shot down our oxen, cows, hogs and fowls, at our own doors, taking part away, and leaving the rest to rot in the streets. The soldiers also turned their horses into our fields of corn.

Here the witness shewn General Clark's speech, which is as follows, viz:
"GENTLEMEN.—You whose names are not attached to this list of names, will now have the privilege of going to your fields, and of providing corn, wood, &c., for your families. Those that are now taken will go from this to prison, be tried, and receive the due dement of their crimes; but you, (except such as charges may hereafter be preferred against,) are at liberty as soon as the troops are removed that now guard the place, which I shall cause to be done immediately. It now devolves upon you to fulfill the treaty that you have entered into, the leading items of which I shall now lay before you.
The first requires that your leading men be given up to be tried according to law; this you have complied with. The second is, that you deliver up your arms; this has also been attended to. The third stipulation is, that you sign over your properties to defray the expenses that have been incurred on your account; this you have also done. Another article yet remains for you to comply with—and that is, that you leave the State forthwith. And whatever may be your feelings concerning this, or whatever your innocence is, it is nothing to me. General Lucas (whose military rank is equal with mine) has made this treaty with you; I approve of it. I should have done the same had I been here, and am therefore determined to see it executed. The character of this State has suffered almost beyond redemption, from the character, conduct and influence that you have exercised; and we deem it an act of justice to restore her character by every proper means.— The order of the Governor to me was, that you should be exterminated, and not allowed to remain in the State. And had not your leaders been given up, and the terms of the treaty complied with before this time, your families would have been destroyed, and your houses in ashes. There is a discretionary power vested in my hands, which, considering your circumstances, I shall exercise for a season. You are indebted to me for this clemency. I do not say that you shall go now, but you must not think of staying here another season, or of putting in crops; for the moment you do this the citizens will be upon you; and if I am called here again in case of non-compliance with the treaty made, do not think that I shall act as I have done now. You need not expect any mercy, but extermination, for I am determined the Governor's order shall be executed. As for you Leaders, do not think, do not imagine for a moment, do not let it enter into your minds that they will be delivered and restored to you again, for their fate is fixed, the die is cast, their destruction is sealed. I am sorry, Gentlemen, to see so many apparently intelligent men found in the situation that you are; and Oh! if I could invoke that Great Spirit of the unknown God to rest upon and deliver you from that awful chain of superstition, and liberate you from those fetters of fanaticism with which you are bound—that you no longer do homage to a man. I would advise you to scatter abroad, and never again organize yourselves with Bishops, Priests, &c., lest you excite the jealousies of the people and subject yourselves to the same calamities that have now come upon you. You have always been the aggressors—you have brought upon yourselves these difficulties, by being disaffeced, and not being subject to rule. And my advice is, that you become as other citizens, lest by a recurrence of these events you bring upon yourselves irretrievable ruin."

Yes, as far as it goes, continued he, I was present when that speech was delivered, and when fifty-seven of our brethren were bettrayed into the hands of our enemies as prisoners, which was done at the instigation of our open and avowed enemies: such as William McClellan and others, and the treachery of Colonel Hinkle. In addition to the speech referred to, General Clark said that, we must not be seen as many as five together. If you are, said he, the citizens will be upon you, and destroy you; but to flee immediately out of the State. There was no alternative for them but to flee: that they need not expect any redress, for there was none for them. With respect to the treaty, the witness further says, that there never was any treaty proposed or entered into on the part of the Mormons, or even thought of.
As to the leaders being given up, there was no such contract entered into or thought of by the Mormons, or any one called a Mormon, except by Colonel Hinkle. And with respect to the trial of the prisoners at Richmond: I do not consider that a fair trial was given, but an inquisition—for the following reasons: That Mr.
Smith was not allowed any evidence whatever on his part, for the conduct of the court, as well as the judge's own words affirmed, that there was no law for Mormons in the State of Missouri. And he also knew that when Mr. Smith left the State of Missouri, he did not flee from justice, for the plain reason that the officers and the people manifested by their works and their words, that there was no law, nor justice for the people called Mormons. And further he knew that Mr. Smith has ever been a strong advocate for the laws and constitutions of his country—and that there was no act of his life while in the State of Missouri, according to his knowledge, that could be implied or construed in any way whatever, to prove him a fugitive from justice; or that he has been guilty of "murder, treason, arson, larceny, theft, and stealing," the crimes he was charged with by General Clark, when he delivered him over to the civil authorities; and he supposes that the learned general did not know but there was a difference between "larceny, theft and stealing."

The witness also says that they compelled the brethren to give away their property by exacting a Deed of Trust, at the point of the bayonet, and that Judge Cameron stood and saw the Mormons sign away their property, and then he and others would run and kick up their heels, and said they were glad of it, and "we have nothing to trouble us now." This judge also said, God damn them, see how well they feel now. General Clark also said he had authority to make what treaties he pleased; and the governor would sanction it.

The witness also stated that he never transgressed any of the laws of Missouri; and he never knew a Latter Day Saint break a law while there. He also said that if they would search the records of Clay, Caldwell, or Davies counties, they could not find one record of crime against a Latter Day Saint, or even in Jackson county, so far as witness knew.

BRIGHAM YOUNG.

LYMAN WRIGHT sworn. Says that he has been acquainted with Joseph Smith Senior for the last twelve years, and that he removed to the State of Missouri in the year 1831, when the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints was organized, agreeably to the law of the land. No particular difficulty took place until after some hundreds had assembled in that land who believed in the Book of Mormon, and Revelations which were given through said Joseph Smith Senior. After nearly two years of peace had elapsed, a strong prejudice arose among the various sects arose, declaring that Joseph Smith was a false prophet, and ought to die; and I heard hundreds say they had never known the man, but if they could come across him, they would kill him as soon as they would a rattlesnake. Frequently heard them say of those who believed in the doctrine he promulgated, that if they did not renounce it, they would exterminate or drive them from the country in which they lived. On enquiring of them if they had any prejudice against us, they said No, but Joe Smith ought to die, and if he ever comes to this country, we will kill him, God damn him.
Matters went on thus until some time in the summer of 1833, when mobs assembled in considerable bodies, frequently visiting private houses, threatening them with death and destruction instantly, if they did not renounce Joe Smith as a prophet, and the Book of Mormon. Some time towards the last of the summer of 1833, they commenced their operations of mobocracy. On account of their priests, by making in their prejudices against Joseph Smith Senior, as I believe, gangs of from thirty to sixty, visiting the house of George Bebee, calling him out of his house at the hour of midnight, with many guns and pistols pointed at his breast, beating him most inhumanly with clubs and whips; and the same night or night afterwards, this gang unroofed thirteen houses in what was called the Whittier Branch of the Church in Jackson county. These scenes of mobocracy continued to exist with unabated fury. Mobs went from house to house, thrusting poles and rails in at the windows and doors of the houses of the Saints, tearing down a number of houses, turning hogs, horses, &c., into cornfields, burning fences, &c. Some time in the month of October, they broke into the store of S. Gilbert & Co., and I marched up with thirty or forty men to witness the scene and found a man by the name of McArtty bricking the store door with all fury, the silks, calicoes, and other fine goods, entwined about his feet, reaching within the door of the store-house. McArtty was arrested and taken before square Weston, by seven testimonies, and then acquitted without delay. The next day the witnesses were taken before the same man for false imprisonment, and by the testimony of this one burglar, were found guilty, and committed to jail. This so exasperated my feelings that I went with two hundred men to enquire into the affair, when I was promptly met by the colonel of the militia, who stated to me that the whole had been a religious farce, and had grown out of a prejudice they had imbibed against said Joseph Smith, a man with whom they were not acquainted. I here agreed that the church would give up their arms, provided the said Colonel Pitcher would take the arms from the mob. To this the colonel cheerfully agreed, and pledged his honor with that of Lieutenant Governor Boggs, Owen, and others. This treaty entered into, we returned home, resting assured on their honor, that we would not be further molested. But this sal-vo contract was violated in every sense of the word. The arms of the mob were never given up, and the mob, with the exception of a few certain knowledge, were engaged the next day with the mob, (Colonel Pitcher and Boggs not excepted,) going from house to house in gangs of from sixty to seventy in number, threatening the lives of women and children, if they did not leave forthwith. In this diabolical scene, men were chased from their houses and homes,

without any preparations for themselves or families. I was chased by one of these gangs across an open prairie five mile without being overtaken, and lay three weeks in the woods.
And was three days and three nights without food. In the mean time, my wife and three small children, in a skiff passed down Big Blue river a distance of fourteen miles and crossed over the Missouri river, and there borrowed a cow, and one of her friends and made a tent of the same, which was the only shield from the inclemency of the weather during the three weeks of my expulsion from home. Having found my family in this situation, and making some enquiry I was informed I had been handled through Jackson, Lafayette and Clay counties, and also the Indian territory. Having made the enquiry of my family, why it was they had no such against me, the answer was,
"He believes in Joe Smith and the Book of Mormon, God damn him, and we believe Joe Smith to be a damned rascal!" Here on the bank of the Missouri river were eight families, exiled from pinto to homes, without one particle of provisions, or any other means under the heavens to get any only by hunting in the forest. I here built a camp twelve feet square, against a sycamore log, in which my wife bore me a fine son on the 27th of December. The camp having neither chimney nor floor, nor covering sufficient to shield them from the inclem-ency of the weather, rendered it intolerable.
In this doleful condition, I left my family for the express purpose of making an appeal to the American people to know something of the treatment of such vile and inhuman conduct, and travelled one thousand and three hundred miles through the interior of the United States, and was frequently answered "That such conduct was not justifiable in a republican government; yet we feel to say that Joe Smith is a very bad man, and circumstances alter cases. We would not wish to prejudice a man, but in some circumstances, the voice of the people ought to rule." The most of these expressions were from professors of religion; and in the aforesaid persecution, I saw one hundred and ninety women and children driven thirty miles across the prairie, with three decepting men only in their company, in the month of Nov., the ground thinly crusted with snow, and I could easily follow on their trail by the blood that flowed from their lacerated feet! on the stubble of the burnt prairie. This company not knowing the situation of the country, nor the extent of Jackson county, built quite a number of cabins, that proved to be in the borders of Jackson county. The mob, infuriated at this, rushed on them in the month of January 1834, burned these scanty cabins, and seattered the inhabitants to the four winds, from which cause many were taken suddenly ill, and of this illness died. In the mean time, they burned two hundred and three houses and one grist mill, these being the only residences of the Saints in Jackson county.

The most part of one thousand and two hundred Saints, who resided in Jackson county, made their escape to Clay county. I would here remark that among one of the companies that went to Clay county, was a woman named Sarah Ann Higbee who had been sick of chills and fever for many months; and another of the name of Keziah Higbee, who was under the most delicate circumstances, lay on the bank of the river, without shelter, during one of the most stormy nights I ever witnessed, while torrents of rain poured down during the whole night, and streams of the smallest rivulets were magnified into rivers. The former was carried across the river, apparently a lifeless corpse.—
The latter was delivered of a fine son, on the bank, within twenty minutes after being carried across the river, under the open canopy of heaven, and from which cause, I have every reason to believe, she died a premature death.
The only consolation they received, under these circumstances, was "God damn you, do you believe in Joe Smith now?" During this whole time, the said Joseph Smith, Senior, lived in Ohio, in the town of Kirtland, according to the best of my knowledge and belief, a distance of eleven hundred miles from Jackson county, and thinks that the church had but little correspondence with him during that time.
We now mostly found ourselves in Clay county—some in negro cabins—some in gentlemen's kitchens—some in old cabins that had been out of use for years—and others in the open air, without anything to shelter them from the dreary storms of a cold and stormy winter.

Thus like men of servitude we went to work to obtain a scanty living among the inhabitants of Clay county. Every advantage which could be taken of a people under these circumstances was not neglected by the people of Clay county.
A great degree of friendship prevailed between the Saints and this people under these circumstances for the space of two years; when the Saints commenced purchasing some small possessions for themselves; this together with the emigration created a jealousy on the part of the old citizens—that we were to be their servants no longer. This raised an apparent indignation and the first thing expressed in this excitement was: "you believe too much in Joe Smith,"— consequently they commenced catching the Saints in the streets, whipping some of them until their bowels gushed out, and leaving others Saints that they mutually agreed with the citizens of Clay county that they would purchase an entire new county north of Ray and cornering on Clay. There being not more than 40 or 50 inhabitants in this new county, who frankly sold out their possessions to the Saints, who immediately set in to enter the entire county from the General Government. The county having been settled, the Governor issued an order for the organization of the county into a regiment of militia, and an election being called for a Colonel of said regiment—I was elected unanimously, receiving 236 votes, in August 1837. Then organized with subaltern officers according to the statutes of the State, and received legal and lawful commissions from Governor Boggs for the same.

I think, sometime in the latter part of the winter said Joseph Smith moved to the district of country the Saints had purchased, and he settled down like other citizens of a new county, and was appointed the first Elder in the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, holding no office in the county either civil or military. I declare that I never knew said Joseph Smith to dictate by his influence or otherwise any of the officers either civil or military, he himself being exempt from military duty from the amputation from his leg of a part of the bone on account of a fever sore.

I removed from Caldwell to Davies county, purchased a pre-emption right, for which I gave 750 dollars, gained another by the side thereof, put in a large crop and became acquainted with the citizens of Davies, who appeared very friendly. In the month of June or July there was a town laid off, partly on my pre-emption, and partly on lands belonging to Governor At—the emigration commenced flowing to this newly laid off town very rapidly. This excited a prejudice in the minds of some of the old citizens who were an ignorant set, and not very far advanced before the aborigines of the country in civilization or cultivated minds, fearing lest this rapid tide of emigration should deprive them of office of which they were dear lovers. This was more plainly exhibited at the Aug. election in the year 1838. The old settlers then swore that not one Mormon would vote at that election; accordingly they commenced operations by fist and skull;
this terminated in the loss of some teeth, some flesh, and some blood. The combat being very strongly contested on both sides—many Mormons were deprived of their votes; and I was followed to the polls by three millions with stones in their hands, swearing they would kill me if I voted.

A false rumor was immediately sent to Far West, such as two or three Mormons were killed and were not suffered to be buried. The next day a considerable number of the Saints came out to my house—said Joseph Smith came with them—he enquired of me concerning the difficulty—the answer was political difficulties—he then asked if there was anything serious—the answer was, no, I think not—we then all mounted our horses and rode up into the Prairie a short distance from my house to a cool spring near the house of Esq. Black where the greater number stopped for refreshment, whilst a few waited on Esq. Black—he was interrogated to know whether he justified the course of conduct at the late election or not—he said he did not,
and was willing to give his protest in writing, which he did, and also desired that there should be a public meeting called which I think was done on the next day. Said Joseph Smith was not addressed on the subject but I was, who,

in behalf of the Saints, entered into an agreement with the other citizens of the county that we would live in peace, enjoying those blessings ought for by our forefathers, but while some of their leading men were entering into this contract, others were raising mobs, and in a short time the mob increased to 205 rank and file, and they encamped within six miles of Ondiahman.
In the mean time Joseph Smith and those who came with him from Far West returned to their homes in peace suspecting nothing—but I seeing the rage of the mob and their full determination to drive the Church from Davies county, sent to General Atchison (Major General of the Division in which we lived,) he immediately sent Brigadier General Doniphan, with between 200 and 300 men. Genl. Doniphan moved his troops near the mob force, and came up and conversed with me on the subject—after conversing some time on the subject, Major Hughes came and informed General Doniphan that his men were mutinizing, and the mob were determined to fall on the Saints in Ondiahman. I having a Col's commission under Doniphan, was commanded to call out my troops forthwith, and to use Doni-phan's own language "kill every G—d—n mobocrat or make them prisoners, and if they come upon you give them hell!"—he then returned his troops and gave them an address, stating the interview he had with me, and he also said to the mob, that if they were so disposed they could go on with their measures—that he considered that Col. Wight with the militia under his command all-sufficient to quell every G—d mobocrat in the county, and if they did not feel disposed so to do, to go home or G—d
—then he would kill every one of them.—
The mob then dispersed. During these movements Joseph Smith nor any of those of Far West or any other place were not at Ondiahman only those who were settlers and legal citizens of the place. The mob again assembled and went to De Witt, Carroll county, there being a small branch of the Church at that place, but of the transactions at this place I have no personal knowledge. They succeeded in driving the Church from that place, some to the east and some to the west, &c. This increased their ardor, and with redoubled forces from several counties to renew the attacks, many unwanted attacks and violations of the rights of citizens took place at this time from the hands of this hellish band. I believing forbearance no longer to be a virtue, again sent to the Major General for military aid, who ordered out Brigadier General Parks. Parks came part of the way, but fearing his men would mutinize and join the mob, he came on ahead and conversed with me a considerable time. The night previous to his arrival the wife of Don Carlos Smith was driven from her house by this ruthless mob, and came into Ondiahman, a distance of three miles, carrying two children on her hips, one of which was then rising of two years old, the other six or eight months old—the snow being over shoe-mouth deep, and she having to wade Grand River which was at this time waist deep, and the mob burnt the house and every thing they had in it—and General Parks, passing the ruins thereof, seemed fired with indignation at their hellish conduct, and said he had hitherto thought it imprudent to call upon the militia under my command in consequence of popular opinion; but he now considered it no more than justice that I should have command of my own troops, and said to me, "I therefore command you forthwith to raise your companies immediately and take such course as you may deem best in order to disperse the mob from this county." I then called out sixty men and placed them under the command of Captain David W. Patton, and I also took about the same number—Capt. Patton was ordered to Gal-latia, where a party of the mob were located, and I to Millport, where another party was located. I and Captain Patton formed the troops under our command, and General Parks addressed them as follows:—
"Gentlemen, I deplore your situation—I regret that transactions of this nature should have transpired in our once happy State—your condition is certainly not an enviable one—surrounded by mobs on one side, and popular opinion and prejudice against you on the other—gladly would I fly to your relief with my troops, but I fear it would be worse for you—most of them have relations living in this county, and will not fight against them. One of my principal Captains, namely Samuel Bogard and his men have already mutinized and have refused to obey my command. I can only say to you, gentlemen, follow the command of Colonel Wight, whom I have commanded to disperse all mobs found in Davies county, or to make them prisoners and bring them before the civil authorities forthwith.
I wish to be distinctly understood that Colonel Wight is vested with power and authority from me to disperse from your midst all who may be found on the side of mobocracy in the county of Davies. I deeply regret gentlemen (knowing as I do the vigilance and perseverance of Colonel Wight in the cause of freedom and rights of man) that I could not even be a soldier under his command in quelling the hellish outrages I have witnessed. In conclusion, gentlemen, be vigilant and persevere and ally every excitement of mobocracy. I have visited your place frequently—and you to be an industrious and thriving people, willing to abide the laws of the land.—
And I deeply regret that you could not live in peace and enjoy the privileges of freedom. I shall now, gentlemen, return and dismiss my troops and put Captain Bogard under an arrest—leave the sole charge with Colonel Wight, who

I deem sufficiently qualified to perform according to law in all military operations necessary."

Captain Patton then went to Gallatin, when coming in sight of Gallatin, he discovered about 100 of the mob holding some of the Saints in bondage, and tantalizing others in the most scandalous manner—at the sight of Captain Patton and company the mob took fright and such was their hurry to get away, some cut their bridle reins, and some pulled the bristles from their horses' heads and went off with all speed, nothing to prevent the speed of their horses.

I went to Millport, and on my way discovered that the inhabitants had become enraged at the orders of the Generals Doniphan and Parks, and that they had sworn vengeance, not only against the Church but also against the two Generals, together with General Atchison, and to carry out their plans they entered into one of the most diabolical schemes ever entered into by man, and these hellish schemes were injuriously carried out: Firstly, by loading their families and goods in covered wagons, setting fire to their houses, moving into the midst of the mob and crying out the Mormons were killing and burning every thing before them, and that great fears were entertained that they would reach Jefferson city before the runners could bring the news. This was not known by the Church of Latter Day Saints, until 22nd of the militia had arrived within half a mile of Far West, and they then supposed the militia to be a mob. I was sent for from Ordabraham to Far West—reached there the sun about one hour high in the morning of the 29th of October, 1838, called upon Joseph Smith, enquired the cause of the great uproar, he declared he did not know, but feared the mob had increased their numbers, and was endeavoring to destroy us—I enquired of him if he had had any conversation with any one concerning the matter—he said he had not, as he was only a private citizen of the county—that he did not interfere with any such matters. I think that he told me there had been an order from General Atchison or Doniphan, one to the Sheriff to call out the militia in order to quell the riots, and to go to him he could give any information on this subject, on enquiring for him I found him not. That between 3 and 4 o'clock, P. M., George M. Hinkle Colonel of the militia in that place called on me in company with Joseph Smith, and said Hinkle said he had been in the camp in order to learn the intention of the same, he said they greatly desired to see Joseph Smith, Lyman Wight, Sidney Rigdon, P. P. Pratt, and George W. Robinson; Joseph Smith first enquired why they should desire to see him as he held no office either civil or military. I next enquired why it was they should desire to see a man out of his own county. Colonel Hinkle here observed there is no time for controversy, if you are not into the camp immediately they are determined to come upon Far West before the setting of the sun, but religious bodies. He said that if the aforesaid persons went into the camp they would be liberated that night or very early next morning, that there should be no harm done.—We consulted together and agreed to go down—on going about half the distance from the camp, I observed it would be well for Generals Lucas, Doniphan, and others, to meet us and not have us go in so large a crowd of soldiers—accordingly the Generals moved onwards, followed by 50 Artillery men with a four pounder. The whole 2200 moved in steady pace on the right and left keeping about even with the former. General Lucas approached the aforesaid designated persons with a vile, base, and treacherous look in his countenance—I shook hands with him and saluted him thus: "we understand General you wish to confer with us a few moments, will not to-morrow morning do as well." At this moment George M. Hinkle spoke and said, here General are the prisoners, I agreed to deliver to you. General Lucas then brandished his sword with a most hideous look, and said you are my prisoners, and there is no time for talking at the present, you will march into the camp. At this moment I believe that there was 500 guns cocked and not less than 200 caps burst, and more hideous yells were never heard, even if the description of the yells of the damned in hell is true as given by the modern sects of the day. The aforesaid designated persons were there introduced into the midst of 2200 mob militia. They then called out a guard of 50 men, placing 30 around the prisoners who were on duty 2 hours and 4 off—prisoners were placed on the ground with nothing to cover but the heavens, and they were overshadowed by clouds that moistened them before morning.—Sidney Rigdon was of a delicate constitution, received a slight shock of Apoplectic fits which excited great laughter and much ridicule in the guard and mob militia. Thus the prisoners spent a doleful night in the midst of a prejudiced and diabolical community. Next day Hyrum Smith and Amasa Lyman were dragged from their families and brought prisoners into the camp—they alleging no other reason for taking Hyrum Smith than that he was brother to Joe Smith the Prophet, and one of his counsellors as President of the Church. The prisoners spent this day as comfortably as could be expected under the existing circumstances. Night came on and under the dark shadows of the night, General Wilson, subaltern of General Lucas, took me one side, and said we do not wish to hurt you nor kill you, neither shall you be by G—d—but we have one thing against you, and that is you are too friendly to Joe Smith, and we believe him to be a G—d—ascal: and Wight you know all about his character—I said, I do sir—I will you swear all you know concerning him said Wilson—I will sir, was the answer I gave—give us the outlines said Wilson—I then told said Wilson I believed said Joseph Smith to be the most philanthropic man he ever saw and possessed of the most pure and republican principles, a friend to mankind, a maker of peace and sir, had it not been that I had given heed to his counsel I would have given you help before this time with all your mob forces, he then observed: Wight, I fear your life is in danger for there is no end to the prejudice against Joe Smith—kill and be d—d sir, was my answer. He answered said and there is to be a court martial held this night, and will you attend sir?

I will not, unless compelled by force, was my reply. He returned about 11 o'clock that night and took me aside, and said I regret to tell you your die is cast, your doom is fixed, you are sentenced to be shot to-morrow morning on the public square, in Far West, at 8 o'clock. I answered, shoot, and he d—d.

We were in hopes said he, you would come out against Joe Smith, but as you have not you will have to share the same fate with him. I answered, you may thank Joe Smith that you are not in hell this night; for had it not been for him, I would have put you there. Some where about this time General Doniphan came up and said to me: Colonel, the decision is a damned hard one, and I have washed my hands against such cool and deliberate murder. He further told me, that General Graham and several others, (names not recollected) were with him in the decision, and opposed it with all their power; that he should move his soldiers away by day light, in the morning; that they should not witness such a heartless murder, Colonel, I wish you well. I then returned to my fellow prisoners, to spend another night on the cold damp earth, and the canopy of heaven to cover us. The night again proved a damp one. At the removal of General Doniphan's part of the army, the camp was thrown into the utmost confusion and consternation. General Lucas, leaving the consequence of such hasty and inconsiderate measures, revoked the decree of shooting the prisoners, and determined to take them to Jackson county. Consequently, he delivered the prisoners over to General Wilson, ordering him to take them safe to Independence, Jackson county. About the hour the prisoners were to have been shot on the public square in Far West, they were exhibited in a wagon in the town, all of them having families there, but myself; and it would have broken the heart of any person possessing an ordinary share of humanity, to have seen the separation. The aged father and mother of Joseph Smith were not permitted to see his face, but to reach their hands through the curtains of the wagon, and thus take leave of him. When passing his own house, he was taken out of the wagon and permitted to go into the house, but not without a strong guard, and not permitted to speak with his family but in the presence of his guard and his eldest son Joseph, about six or eight years old, hanging to the tail of his coat, crying father, is the mob going to kill you? The guard said to him, you damned little brat, go back, you will see your father no more. The prisoners then set out for Jackson county, accompanied by Generals Lucas and Wilson, and about three hundred troops for a guard. We remained in Jackson county two or three days and nights, during most of which time, the prisoners were treated in a gentlemanly manner, and boarded at a hotel, for which they had afterwards, when confined in Liberty jail, to pay the most extravagant price, or have their property, if any they had, attached for the same.—At this time General Clark had arrived at Richmond, and by orders from the governor, took on him, notwithstanding General Atchison's commission was the oldest, but he was supposed to be too friendly to the Mormons; and therefore dismounted, and General Clark sanctioned the measures of General Lucas, however cruel they might have been; and said, he should have done the same had he been there himself. Accordingly he remanded the prisoners from Jackson county, and they were taken and escorted by a strong guard to Richmond; threatened several times on the way with violence and death. They were met five miles before they reached Richmond, by about one hundred armed men, and when they arrived in town they were thrust into an old cabin under a strong guard. I was informed by one of the guards, that two nights previous to their arrival, General Clark had a court martial, and the prisoners were again sentenced to be shot; but he being a little doubtful of his authority, sent immediately to Fort Leavenworth for the military law, and a decision from the United States' officers, where he was duly informed, that any such proceeding would be a cool-blooded and heartless murder. On the arrival of the prisoners at Richmond, Joseph Smith and myself sent for General Clark; to be informed by him what crimes were alleged against us. He came in and said he would see us again in a few minutes; shortly he returned and said he would inform us of the crimes alleged against us by the state of Missouri.

"Gentlemen, you are charged with treason, murder, arson, burglary, larceny, theft, and stealing, and various other charges too tedious to mention, at this time;" and he left the room. In about twenty minutes, there came in a strong guard, together with the keeper of the penitentiary of the state, who brought with him two common trace chains, noosed together by putting the small end through the ring; and commenced chaining us up one by one, and fastening with padlocks, about two feet apart. In this unallowable situation, the prisoners remained fifteen days, and in this situation, General Clark delivered us to the professed civil authorities of the state, without any legal process being served on us at all, during the whole time we were kept in chains, with nothing but ex-parte evidence; and that either by the vilest apostates, or by the mob who had committed murder in the state of Missouri. Notwithstanding all this ex-parte evidence, Judge King did inform our lawyer, ten days previous to the termination of the trial, who he should commit and who he should not; and I heard Judge King say on his bench, in the presence of hundreds of witnesses, that there was no law for Mormons, and they need not expect any. Said he, if the governor's exterminating order had been directed to me, I would have seen it fulfilled to the very letter ere this time.

After a tedious trial of fifteen days, with no other witnesses but ex-parte ones, the witnesses, for prisoners were either kicked out of doors or put on trial for themselves. The prisoners were now committed to Liberty jail, under the care and direction of Samuel Tillery, jailor.—Here we were received with a shout of indignation and scorn, by the prejudiced populace. Prisoners were here thrust into jail without a regular mittimus; the jailor having to send for one some days after. The mercies of the jailor were intolerable, feeding us with a scanty allowance, on the dregs of coffee and tea, from his own table, and fetching the provisions in a basket, on which the chickens had roosted the night before, without being cleaned; five days he fed the prisoners on human flesh, and from extreme hunger I was compelled to eat it. In this situation we were kept until about the month of April, when we were remanded to Davies county for trial before the grand jury.—We were kept under the most loathsome and despicable guards they could produce in that county of lawless mobs. After six or eight days the grand jury, (most of whom by the by, were so drunk that they had to be carried out and into their rooms as though they were lifeless), formed a fictitious indictment, which was sanctioned by Judge Birch, who was the State's Attorney under Judge King at our ex-parte trial, and who at that time stated that the Mormons ought to be hung without judge or jury, he said judge, made out a mittimus without day or date, ordering the sheriff to take us to Columbia. The sheriff selected four men to guard five of us. We then took a circuitous route, crossing prairies sixteen miles without houses, and after travelling three days the sheriff and I were together, by ourselves five miles from any of the rest of the company, for sixteen miles at a stretch. The sheriff here observed to me, that he wished to God he was at home, and your friends and you also. The sheriff then showed me the mittimus, and he found it had neither day or date to it; and said the inhabitants of Davies county would be surprised that the prisoners had not left them sooner; and said he, by God, I shall not go much further. We were then near Yellow creek, and there were no houses nearer one way than sixteen miles and eleven another way; except right on the creek. Here a part of the guard took a spree while the balance helped us to mount our horses, which we purchased of them and for which they were paid. Here we took a change of venue and went to Quincy without difficulty, where we found our families who had been driven out of the state under the exterminating order of Governor Boggs. I never knew of Joseph Smith's holding any office, civil or military, or using any undue influence in religious matters during the whole routine of which I have been speaking.

LYMAN WIGHT.

SIXTYE RICHMOND, sworn. Says, I arrived in Far West, Caldwell county, Missouri, on the 4th of April, 1838, and enjoyed peace and quietness in common with the rest of the citizens, until the August following, when great excitement was created by the office seekers. Attempts were made to prevent the citizens of Caldwell from voting. Soon after the election, which took place in the early part of August, the citizens of Caldwell were threatened with violence from those of Davis county; and other counties adjacent to Caldwell.

This, the August 1838, I may date as the time of the beginning of all the troubles of our people in Caldwell county, and in all the counties in the state, where our people were living. Until this time, but from this time till we were all out of the state, it was but one scene of violence following another in quick succession. There were at this time, settlements in Clay, Ray, Carroll, Caldwell, and Davis counties, as well as some families living in other counties. A simultaneous movement was made in all the counties where settlements were made in every part of the state, which soon became violent, and threatenings were heard from every quarter. Public meetings were held and the most inflammatory speeches made, and resolutions passed which denounced all the citizens of these counties in the most bitter and rancorous manner. These resolutions were published in the papers, and the most extensive circulation given to them, that the press of the country were capable of giving.

The first regular mob that assembled was in Carroll county, and their efforts were directed against the settlements made in that county, declaring their determination to drive out of the county all the citizens who were of our religion, and that indiscriminately, without regard to any thing else but their religion. The only evidence necessary to dispossess any individual or family, or all the evidence required, would be that they were Mormons, as we were called, or rather that they were of the Mormon religion. This was considered of itself crime enough to cause any individual or family to be driven from their homes, and their property made common plunder. Resolutions to this effect, were made at public meetings held for the purpose, and made public through the papers of the state in the face of all law, and all authority.

I will now give a history of the settlement in Carroll county. In the preceding April, as myself and family were on our way to Far West, we put up at a house in Carroll county, on a stream called Turkey creek, to tarry for the night. Soon after we stopped, a young man came riding up who also stopped and came through the night. Hearing my name mentioned he introduced himself to me as Henry Root, said he lived in that county at a little town called De Witt, on the Missouri river, and had been at Far West, to get some of those who were coming into that place, to form a settlement at De Witt; speaking highly of the advantages of the situation, and soliciting my interference in his behalf, to obtain a number of families to commence at that place, as he offered a liberal share in all the profits which might arise from the sale of property there, to those who would aid him in getting the place settled. In the morning we proceeded on our journey.

Some few weeks after my arrival, the said Henry Root, in company with a man by the name of David Thomas, came to Far West on the same business; and after much solicitation on their part, it was agreed that a settlement should be made in that place, and in the July following, the first families removed there, and the settlement soon increased, until in the October following, it consisted of some seventy families. By this time a regular mob had collected, strongly armed; and had obtained possession of a cannon, and stationed a mile or two from the town. The citizens being nearly all new comers, had to live in their tents and wagons, and were exerting themselves to the utmost to get houses for the approaching winter. The mob commenced committing their depredations on the citizens, by not suffering them to procure the materials for building, keeping them shut up in the town, not allowing them to go out to get provisions, driving off their cattle, and preventing the owners from going in search of them. In this way the citizens were driven to the greatest extremities, actually suffering for food and every comfort of life, in consequence of which there was much sickness and many died; females gave birth to children without a house to shelter them, and in consequence of the exposure, many suffered great afflictions and many died.

Hearing of their great sufferings, a number of the men of Far West determined on going to see what was doing there. Accordingly we started, eluded the vigilance of the mob, and notwithstanding they had sentinels placed on all the principal roads, to prevent relief from being sent to the citizens, safely arrived in De Witt, and found the people as above stated.

During the time we were there, every effort that could be, was made to get the authorities of the county to interfere and scatter the mob. The judge of the circuit court was petitioned, but without success, and after that the governor of the state, who returned for answer that the citizens of De Witt had got into a difficulty with the surrounding country, and they might get out of it for he would have nothing to do with it, or this was the answer that the messenger brought when he returned.

The messenger was a Mr. Caldwell, who owned a ferry on Grand river, about three miles from De Witt, and was an old settler in the place.

The citizens were completely besieged by the mob, no man was at liberty to go out, nor any to come in. The extremities to which the people were driven, were very great, suffering with much sickness, without shelter, and deprived of all aid either medical or any other kind, and being without food or the privilege of getting it, and betrayed by every man who made the least pretension to friendship; a notable instance of which I will here give as a sample of many others of a similar kind. There was neither bread nor flour to be had in the place; a steamboat landed there and application was made to get flour but the captain said there was none on board. A man then offered his services to get flour for the place; knowing, he said, where there was a quantity. Money was given to him for that purpose; he got on the boat and went off; and that was the last we heard of the man or the money. This was a man who had been frequently in De Witt during the siege, and professed great friendship. In this time of extremity a man who had a short time before moved into De Witt, bringing with him a fine yoke of cattle, started out to hunt his cattle, in order to butcher them to keep the citizens from actual starvation, but before he got but a little way from the town, he was fired upon by the mob and narrowly escaped with his life and had to return, or at least, such was his report when he returned. Being now completely enclosed on every side, we could plainly see many men on the opposite side of the river, and it was supposed that they were there to prevent the citizens from crossing, and indeed a small craft crossed from them with three men in it, who said that that was the object for which they had assembled.

At this critical moment, with death staring us in the face, in its worst form; cut off from all communication with the surrounding country, and all our provisions exhausted, we were sustained as the children of Israel in the desert, only by different animals. They by quails, and us by cattle and hogs which came walking into the camp, for such it truly was, as the people were living in tents and wagons, not being privileged with building houses. What was to be done in this extremity? why, recourse was had to the only means of subsistence left, and that was to butcher the cattle and hogs which came into the place, without asking who the owner, or without knowing, and what to me is remarkable, is, that a sufficient number of animals came into the camp to sustain life during the time in which the citizens were thus besieged by the mob. This indeed was but coarse living, but such as it was, it sustained life.

From this circumstance, the cry went out that the citizens of De Witt, were thieves and plunderers, and were stealing cattle and hogs. During this time the mob of Carroll county said that all they wanted was that the citizens of De Witt should leave Carroll county and go to Caldwell and Davies counties. The citizens finding that they must leave De Witt, or eventually starve, finally agreed to leave; and accordingly preparations were made and De Witt was vacated. The first morning after we left, we put up for the night in a grove of timber. Soon after our arrival in the grove, a female who a short time before had given birth to a child, in consequence of the exposure died. A grave was dug in the grove, and the next morning the body was deposited in it without a coffin, and the company proceeded on their journey; part of them going to Davies county and part into Caldwell. This was in the month of October, 1838.

In a short time after their arrival in Davies and Caldwell counties, messengers arrived informing the new citizens of Caldwell and Davies, that the mob was marching to Davies county, with their cannon with them, threatening death to the citizens, or else that they should all leave Davies county. This caused other efforts to be made to get the authorities to interfere. I wrote two memorials, one to the governor, and one to Austin A. King, circuit judge, imploring their assistance and intervention to protect the citizens of Davies against the threatened violence of the mob.—These memorials were accompanied with affidavits which could leave no doubt on the mind of the governor or judge, that the citizens before mentioned were in eminent danger. At this time things began to assume an alarming aspect both to the citizens of Davies and Caldwell counties. Mobs were forming all around the country, declaring that they would drive the people out of the state. This made our appeals to the authorities more deeply solicitous as the danger increased, and very soon after this the mobs commenced their depredations; which was a general system of plunder: tearing down fences, exposing all within the field to destruction, and driving off every animal they could find.

Sometime previous to this, in consequence of the threatenings which were made by mobs, or those who were being formed into mobs, and the abuses committed by them on the persons and property of the citizens, an association was formed, called the Danite band.

This, as far as I was acquainted with it, (not being myself one of the number, neither was Joseph Smith, Senior,) was for mutual protection against the bands that were forming, and threatened to be formed; for the professed object of committing violence on the property and persons of the citizens of Davies and Caldwell counties. They had certain signs and words by which they could know one another, either by day or night. They were bound to keep those signs and words secret; so that no other person or persons than themselves could know them. When any of these persons were assailed by any lawless band, he would make it known to others who would flee to his relief at the risk of life. In this way they sought to defend each others lives and property, but they were strictly enjoined not to touch any person, only those who were engaged in acts of violence against the persons or property of one of their own number or one of those whose life and property they had bound themselves to defend.

This organization was in existence when the mobs commenced their most violent attempts upon the citizens of the before mentioned counties, and from this association arose all the horror afterwards expressed by the mob at some secret call known as Danites.

The efforts made to get the authorities to interfere at this time was attended with some success. The militia were ordered out under the command of Major General Atchison, of Clay county, Brigadier Generals Doniphan, of Clay, and Parks, of Ray county, who matched their troops to Davies county, where they found a large mob, and General Atchison said in my presence, he took the following singular method to disperse them. He organized them with his troops as part of the militia called out, to suppress and arrest the mob; after having thus organized them, discharged them and all the rest of the troops as having no further need for their services, and all returned home.

This however, seemed only to give the mob more courage to increase their exertions with redoubled vigor. They boasted afterwards, that the authorities would not punish them, and they would do as they pleased. In a very short time their efforts were renewed with a determination not to cease until they had driven the citizens of Caldwell and quah of the citizens of Davies as they had marked out as victims, from the state. A man by the name of Cornelius Gillum who resided in Clay county, and formerly sheriff of said county, organized a band who painted themselves like Indians, and had a place of rendezvous at Hunter's Mills on a stream called Grindstone. I think it was in Clinton county, the county west of Caldwell and between it and the west line of the state. From this place they would sally out and commit their depredations. Efforts were again made to get the authorities to put a stop to these renewed outrages, and again General Doniphan and General Parks were called out with such portions of their respective brigades as they might deem necessary to suppress the mob, or rather mobs, for by this time there were a number of them. General Doniphan came to Far West, and while there, recommended to the authorities of Caldwell to have the militia of said county called out as a necessary measure of defence; asserting is that Gillum had a large mob on the Grindstone, and his object was to make a descent upon Far West, burn the town and kill or disperse the inhabitants; and that it was very necessary that an effective force should be ready to oppose him, or he would accomplish his object.

The militia was accordingly called out. He also said that there had better be a strong force sent to Davies county to guard the citizens there: he recommended that to avoid any difficulties which might arise, they had better go in very small parties, without arms, so that no legal advantage could be taken of them. I will here give a short account of the courts and internal affairs of Missouri, for the information of those who are not acquainted with the same.

Missouri has three courts of law peculiar to that state. The supreme court, the circuit court and the county court. The two former, about the same as in many other states of the Union. The county court, is composed of three judges, elected by the people of the respective counties. This court is in some respects like the court of probate in Illinois, or the surrogate's court of New York; but the powers of this court are more extensive than the courts of Illinois or New York. The judges, or any one of them, of the county court of Missouri, has the power of issuing habeas corpus, in all cases where arrests are made within the county where they reside. They have also all the power of justices of the peace in civil, as well as criminal cases; for instance, a warrant may be obtained from one of these judges, by affidavit, and a person arrested under such warrant. From another of these judges, a habeas corpus may issue, and the person arrested be ordered before him, and the character of the arrest be inquired into, and if in the opinion of the judge, the person ought not to be held by virtue of said process, he has power to discharge him. In the internal regulation of the affairs of Missouri, the counties in some respects are nearly as independent of each other as the several states of the Union. No considerable number of men armed, can pass out of one county into, or through another county, without first obtaining the permission of the judges of the county court, or some one of them, otherwise they are liable to be arrested by the order of said judges, and if in their judgement they ought not thus to pass, they are ordered back from whence they came; and in case of refusal, are subject to be arrested or even shot down in case of resistance. The judges of the county court or any one of them, have the power to call out the militia of said county upon affidavit being made to them for that purpose, by any of the citizens of said county; showing it just, in the judgement of such judge or judge-as, why said militia should be called out to defend any portion of the citizens of said county. The following is the course of procedure: Affidavit is made before one or any number of the judges, setting forth, that the citizens of said county, or any particular portion of them, is either invaded or threatened with invasion by some unlawful assembly whereby their liberties, lives or property may be unlawfully taken. When such affidavit is made to any one of the judges or all of them, it is the duty of him or them, before whom such affidavit is made, to issue an order to the sheriff of the county, to make requisition upon the commanding officer of the militia of said county, to have immediately put under military order such a portion of the militia under his command as may be necessary for the defence of the citizens of said county.

In this way the militia of any county may be called out at any time deemed necessary by the county judges, independently of any other civil authority of the State.

In case that the militia of the county is insufficient to quell the riots, and secure the citizens against the invaders, then requisition can be had to the judge of the circuit court, who has the same power over the militia of his judicial district, as the county judges have over the militia of the county. And in case of insufficiency in the militia of the judicial district of the circuit judge, requisition can be had to the governor of the state, and all the militia of the state called out, and if this should fail, then the governor can call on the President of the United States, and all the forces of the nation be put under arms.

I have given this expose of the internal regulations of the affairs of Missouri, in order that the court may clearly understand what I have before said on this subject, and what I may hereafter say on it.

It was in view of this order of things that General Doniphan, who is a lawyer of some celebrity in Missouri, gave the recommendation he did at Far West, when passing into Davies county with his troops, for the defence of the citizens of said county. It was in consequence of this, that he said, that those of Caldwell county which went into Davies county, should go in small parties, and unarmed, in which condition they were not subject to any arrest from any authority whatever.

In obedience to these recommendations the militia of Caldwell county was called out; affidavit having been made to one of the judges of the county, setting forth the danger which it was believed the citizens were in, from a large marauding party assembled under the command of one Cornelius Gillum, on a stream called Grindstone. When affidavit was made to this effect, the judge issued his order to the sheriff of the county, and the sheriff to the commanding officer, who was Captain G. M. Hinkle, and thus were the militia of the county of Caldwell put under military orders.

General Doniphan however, instead of going into Davies county, soon after he left Far West returned back to Clay county with all his troops, giving as his reason, the mutinous character of his troops; which he said would join the mob, he believed, instead of acting against them, and that he had not power to restrain them.

In a day or two afterwards, General Parks of Ray county, also came to Far West, and said that he had sent on a number of troops to Davies county to act in concert with General Doniphan. He also made the same complaint concerning his troops, that Doniphan had, doubting greatly whether they would render any service to those in Davies who were threatened with violence by the mob assembling; but on learning that Doniphan, instead of going to Davies county had returned to Clay, followed his example and ordered his troops back to Ray county, and thus were the citizens of Caldwell county and those of Davies county, who were marked out as victims by the mob, left to defend themselves the best way they could.

What I have here stated in relation to Generals Doniphan and Parks, were conversations had between myself and them, about which I cannot be mistaken, unless my memory has betrayed me.

The militia of the county of Caldwell were now all under requisition, armed and equipped according to law. The mob after all the authorities of the State had been recalled, except the force of Caldwell county, commenced the work of destruction in earnest; showing a determination to accomplish their object. For Far West, where I resided, which was the shire town of Caldwell county, was placed under the charge of a captain by the name of Killian, who made my house his head quarters; other portions of the troops were distributed in different places in the county, wherever danger was apprehended. In consequence of Captain Killian's making my house his head quarters, I was put in possession of all that was going on, as all intelligence in relation to the operations of the mob was communicated to him. Intelligence was received daily of depredations being committed not only against the property of the citizens, but other persons; many of whom when attending to their business, would be surprised, and taken by marauding parties, tied up and whipped in a most desperate manner. Such outrages were common during the progress of these extraordinary scenes, and all kinds of depredations were committed. Men driving their teams to and from mills where they got grinding done, would be surprised and taken, their persons abused, and their teams, wagons, and loading all, taken as booty, by the plunderers. Fields were thrown upon and all within them exposed to the destruction of such animals as chose to enter. Cattle, horses, hogs and sheep were driven off, and a general system of plunder and destruction of all kinds of property, carried on to the great annoyance of the citizens of Caldwell, and that portion of the citizens of Davies marked as victims by the mob. One afternoon a messenger arrived at Far West calling for help, saying that a banditti had crossed the south line of Caldwell, and were engaged in threatening the citizens with death if they did not leave their homes and go out of the state within a very short time; the time not precisely recollected; but I think it was the next day by ten o'clock, but of this I am not certain. He said they were setting fire to the prairie, in view of burning houses and despo-

power required to raise and sustain it. It is in dispensing with this necessity, and thus reducing very greatly the amount of machinery to be carried, that the chief but not the only peculiarity of Mr. Henson's invention lies; and by this means he has opened a path which seems destined to lead to the accomplishment of this long sought object.

The device by which Mr. Henson has gained so great an additional likelihood of success, applies, not to the construction of the machine, but to the manner of using it. The carriage loaded and prepared for flight, starts from the top of an inclined plain, in descending which, it acquires the velocity necessary for its further flight. The mode in which that velocity sustains it in the air is readily understood; the machine advances with its front edge a little raised, so that its under surface impinges obliquely on the air; that impact is accompanied by a resistance in the air, which is sufficient to prevent the descent of the machine; just as the wind striking the sails of a windmill obliquely presented to it, has power enough to propel them with all the machinery they set in motion.

So far, then, it seems that the velocity gained in descending the inclined plain, is that by which the machine proceeds and is sustained, and, but for hindering forces, would proceed for ever; for it is a mechanical axiom, verified by all the results of art and science, that if hindering forces, could be taken away, a body once put in motion would move for ever. But this motion, through the air, though itself it generates the perpendicular resistance of that fluid by which the machine is sustained as to elevation, generates also at the same time a resistance in the forward direction by which in no long time the motion itself would be destroyed, and the machine brought to the ground. Now it is to repair this decay of speed, to restore every instant the velocity lost in that instant, that the small steam engine embarked in the machine is alone wanted, and it is easy to see that the power required for this effect must be very much less than that which would be necessary to lift and to start the machine; the entire amount of which power, it has hitherto been supposed, the machine itself must carry.

The great novelty, then, of Mr. Henson's aerial carriage, and the very important advance its inventor has made towards success in this off-defeated enterprise, is the separation of the starting from the maintaining power. Although this is no novelty in abstract science, it produces all the effect of a most important invention in its application to this purpose; and it is no slight ground for believing that Mr. Henson will eventually succeed to find that his chief novelty accords so exactly with established science, as far as this device is concerned there is nothing whatever which can raise a doubt. It will be seen from the foregoing extract, that the New Monthly writer has some hope of success. He is far more sanguine than we are with regard to the subject. He contends that it is horizontal velocity that is required, and that this is gained by Mr. Henson, in descending an inclined plane. Large birds frequently resort to this device in starting from an eminence. They first make a curve downwards, the velocity gained in which, with subsequent and easy augmentations, is that which keeps up their flight. Mr. Henson's steam engine is said to be light in comparison with its power. This has been effected in great part, by reducing the necessary weight of water. It is expected to furnish a quantity of steam equivalent to the power of 20 horses. The weight of the whole machine and its load, is estimated at 3000 lbs: the area of the sustaining surfaces will be about 4500 square feet. The load will, therefore, be about two-thirds of a pound to each square foot, which is less by one-third than that of many birds.

It is added that as far as probabilities can be collected from observations on the flight of birds, they warrant a strong expectation of Mr. Henson's success, and that if his engine should be found to need reinforcement, it is said there are available inventions recently matured, whose combined application will much more than double its power.

The pith of the whole matter is, that Mr. Henson has endeavored to manufacture an artificial bird of a large size, and to substitute the will of man conducted through machinery, for the natural impulses, instincts and motions of the bird. Can it be done?

NAUVOO SELECT SCHOOL.

M. R. J. A. BANISTER, recently from New York, proposes opening a school, on Monday the 9th day of July, 1843, on the corner of Broadway and Payley streets, to be denominated the Nauvoo Select School, designed for the instruction of Youth in the following branches, viz. Reading, Writing, Spelling, Orthography, Geography, Arithmetic, Grammar, Composition, Oratory, and Philosophy. From his experience in teaching, Mr. B. feels confident that he can give general satisfaction to both scholar and parents.

The youth that to virtue and honor would rise, His time, books and talents most highly must prize.

It is therefore necessary that the first principle and rudiments of the English language should be, not only early but thoroughly inscribed in the mind of the young. Mr. B.'s plan, therefore, is, to suffer for a scholar to proceed no farther in any branch of education than what he learns to perfection; so that what he does know, he knows sure. Try it and see. Terms per quarter, For Reading, Writing and Arithmetic, $2.00. For Grammar, Composition, Oratory and Philosophy, with the lower branches, $2.50. Each quarter to consist of 12 weeks.

but the strong reason of all was assigned by Sir Robert Peel himself namely, that it was a measure upon which the Canadians had set their hearts; and as Canada was the weaker part of our colonial empire, it was deemed necessary to conciliate them. For this admission he was sharply taken to task by Lord John Russell, who said that according to the showing of the head of the Government it was only necessary for a colony to rise up in rebellion in order to get whatever it wanted.

The measure was an apple of discord as soon as introduced. Peel is said to have threatened resignation unless it carried. The Cabinet staked their existence upon it and the agricultural party had no alternative but to gulp the medicine with very faces, or sacrifice their favorite minister. They preferred the former, as a choice of evils, and throwing their consistency to the winds, and without a thought upon their voting out doors, for the measure of all others which they most profess to abhor.

The firm of John and George Clark, of London, carpet manufacturers, have failed to the amount of £100,000, £90,000 of which they owe one banking firm.

China.—No news but the death of Commissioner Elieppa, fresh attacks were expected on the British factories.

A fire at Dabaria, in Austria, destroyed two hundred houses, among them the Catholic church, and deprived two thousand persons of shelter.

A report was published in the Augsburg Gazette, coming from Cairo on the 21st of May, two ships laden with slaves and been captured by British cruisers in the Red Sea, in the latitude of Sanak; and that the captains of the ships had been hanged at the mainmast. The two slave ships were destroyed (the bodies of the two captains still hanging from the mainmast) by the British cruiser, and the slaves set at liberty.

LATE AND IMPORTANT FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF THE COLUMBIA.
The Cincinnati Inquirer of June 21st says.—The mail of yesterday evening brought us a New York Herald Extra, of Monday morning, and a Liverpool Times of June 4th, the latter published just on the eye of the vessel's sailing, and containing all the important intelligence.

The Repeal in Ireland has yet led to no disturbance, but the excitement is still as great as ever. O'Connell is cautious yet bold, and the meetings that are daily held show that the public voice is determined. The meeting at the Dublin Exchange was immensely thronged, and the 'Repeal Refs' contribution stated a £70 0, 15s 6d. A disturbance in (London) county resulted in the murdering by Orange Men of a poor fellow named M. Caffrey. At Dungannon a fracas took place between Orange Men and the Repealers, on the 30th of May; many persons injured and a house torn down. The Repeal meeting at Cork was attended by 40,000.

All the Irish Forts, castles and battle ments have been inspected by a government engineer, and ordered to be repaired, and placed in a state of perfect utility. Indeed, the preparations of government are such as would indicate that a civil war is not far distant.

The British troops stationed in Ireland in June will amount to 25,000. Forts are repairing and every preparation making by the British to oppose, with an invincible army the first outbreak of the Repealers. Several vessels of war have already landed in the important ports with arms and men, and the inquiry has been officially made how many men will all the forts contain?

Both Wales and Scotland have been disturbed by outrages among the populace—the latter also by the secession of 500 ministers from the Kirk, on account of an interference with their discipline by the civil power.—the former by the peasantry, who collected at night and broke down toll gates on the roads, and beat the keepers.

In the British Parliament the proposition for the admission of Canada flour at a fixed duty of 15s per quarter. No question has been brought before Parliament for years, broken, in fact, uprooted party maneuvering as this Canadian Corn Bill.—Some argued that it was a free trade measure in disguise, between England and the U. States—that the country would be dragged with the produce of the Western States smuggled into Canada—that the duty of 15s to be levied on the Canada frontier was all moonshine, as impalpable as Macbeth's air dagger—that the extent of the frontier afforded the greatest facilities for cheating the Custom-house officers, and that as far as "protection" went, the corn laws might as well be abolished altogether.

Others contended that the American would regard the measure as a declaration that our restrictive commercial policy would still be persevered in.

Others, again, maintained that the concession of such a measure could not be confined to Canada—that if other colonies requested the same boon, it must be conceded to them; and that it was only opening by a "back door" a route which the ministry had not the courage to open in front.

despotism would be thicker than the loins of the old.

And it must come to this one day, and one day soon. All over Great Britain the evidences of an approaching modification of her social institutions are apparent. Large accessions to the popular rights must soon be made. Why then, true friends of human liberty, pray for the violent dismemberment of that ancient and illustrious nation—why deliver up to intestine discord, and violence and blood, its fairest portion, when the might of truth and liberty, advancing in peaceful majesty, tell us to be of good courage, and point to the brightening future!

The Sandwich Islands.—As was anticipated in all properly informed quarters, these Islands have been restored to the British government to the independent authority of their Sovereign—which has thus gained greatly added securities, for as the Times properly remarks, it is to be presumed that the example of England will not be without its influence on other nations, and prevent them from interfering with that which she has recognized in so decided a manner. The acceptance on the part of Admiral Pakenet, of the cession of the Islands to the British crown, are altogether conditional; which could not indeed have been otherwise, as he acted without instructions. Unable to meet demands made upon her by British subjects, the Sovereign of the Islands tendered to the British Admiral his right of government in favor of the British crown for his share in the transaction, Lord Pakenet has been absolved from all blame.

The continued independence of the Sandwich Islands is of great importance to our commercial interests. As Mr. Jarvis, in his recent instructive and valuable work observes, "if the ports of the group were closed to neutral commerce, many thousand miles of ocean would have to be traversed before havens possessing the requisite conveniences for recruiting or repairing shipping, could be reached. This fact illustrates their great importance in a naval point of view. Should any of the great nations seize upon them, it might be considered as holding the Key of the North Pacific—or no trade could prosper in their vicinity, or even exist, whilst a hostile power, possessing an active and powerful marine, should send forth its cruisers to prey upon the neighboring commerce. Their isolated position, in connection with their reef or precipitous shores, would add greatly to the local advantages of defence, and a military colony, once fairly established, might surely put at defiance any means of attack which could be brought against them." About five-eighths of all the vessels visiting the ports of the Islands, are American, and the amount of American property involved there has been rapidly increasing of late years, and now exceeds a million of dollars.

But it is not in a commercial point of view, only, that these fertile and lovely islands possess claims on our attention, and regard. They are at present the scene of some of the brightest triumphs of Christianity and civilization. Missionaries of both the Catholic and Protestant faith, have been zealously dispensing the blessings of the religion of peace and love, and despite of many adverse influences, have been singularly successful in overthrowing idolatry, superstition and error, and converting a land of barbarism and heathenism into one of order, religion and peaceful industry. All the friends of human liberty must therefore rejoice that this recent addition to the extended domains of Christendom, is growing up, prosperously and happily, under the genial influences of a free and independent civil government.

English Exploring Expedition.—We notice in our foreign exchanges, the arrival at St. Helena, on the 20th of May last, of H. B. ships Erebus and Terror, from latitude 78 deg. 10 min. This exploring expedition has been absent upwards of three years, and its destination now is Accu-sion, Brazil, and home to England. The results of the 4th expedition, it is anticipated, will be of considerable importance.

ARRIVAL OF THE HIBERNIA.

Three days later from Europe.

The New York Express of Tuesday the 4th inst., 6 a. m., furnishes us the following foreign news:

The splendid steamer Hibernia, Capt. Judkins, arrived at her wharf at E. W. Boston yesterday morning, at 6 o'clock making the passage in less than 11 days. She brings Liverpool files to the 20th, and London to the 19th ult.

IRELAND.

The debate in the House of Commons on the Irish arms bill, on the 18th, was one of the most animated which has taken place during the session. The policy of the present, as compared with the late government, was reviewed by the friend and opponents of each, with more or less success, and a great deal of animosity.

Matters have come to a crisis no less rapid than critical—but hitherto, beyond sending large bodies of troops to subdue any outbreak that may occur, the government has done nothing to arrest it. But it is clear from the minister's tone, that their patience is exhausted. A few days will probably witness the development of their policy.

An account of another great meeting in that country, developed the bold, indeed he during tone of defiance, which the Irish leader now uses towards the British Government, in stronger colors than any previous one.

Mr. O'Connell declared at the great meeting at Ennis, that the Government were more disposed to conciliate than to coerce; and if they were prepared to sever the church from the state in Ireland, he would meet them in "excellent humor." He stated that Peel and the conciliatory party in the cabinet had prevailed. In London however, the belief is quite the other way; and that the Duke of Wellington's recipe for quelling the Irish by force, had found the greater number of supporters in the cabinet, leaving Peel and the moderate party in a minority.

The language used by Lord Stanley and Sir James Graham, during Friday's debate, in contradistinction to that of Sir Robert Peel, is calculated to strengthen the latter impression. A little time however, will decide the question. The rent is expected this week to reach the enormous sum of £3,000.

Mallow was on Sunday the scene of the next demonstration, at which 400,000 persons are said to have been present. Large bodies of troops and police were stationed in the neighborhood. The enormous multitude paraded the town in procession, and then proceeded to an open space, where Mr. O'Connell delivered an address.

The Daily Standard says the government are watching the matters for prosecuting Mr. O'Connell for high treason.

SPAIN.

The latest news from Spain shows that the embarrasments of the Regent are increasing. Nearly the whole of Catalonia is in arms against him, and a considerable portion of the troops sent to quell the revolt, have abandoned his cause and sided with the movement. The whole of the garrison of Barcelona has declared against Espartero; and the same may be said of the garrison of Tarragona. In Valencia, the governor was killed in an affray, and his body dragged through the streets, and the constituted authorities are hors de combat.

Rumors reached Paris at the end of the week that Espartero and the young Queen of Spain had fled from the capital. The French government is accused of withholding the news from Spain for purposes of its own. There was no truth in the statement, though it is evident that the position of Espartero is still critical. Nothing worthy of note had occurred in France.

Liverpool, June 20.

Cotton.—Business has continued very dull as regards cotton since the departure of the Great Western, and we cannot perceive the least indication of improvement. The market opened very languidly on Saturday, without any speculative inquiry. The supply has proved abundant but no further alteration has taken place in prices.

1 o'clock, p. m.
Our cotton market continues heavy, and prices, though not decidedly lower, are, owing to the very large supply, rather in favor of buyers. The corn trade continues dull, and lower terms have been submitted for wheat. In tobacco, we have no change to notice, and American provisions remain the same as previously noticed.

HORRIBLE AFFAIR—SEDUCTION AND DEATH.

The Commercial Advertiser copies from two Michigan papers an account of the seduction and death of Miss Caroline A. Clarke, aged 13, a beautiful and accomplished young woman of Detroit. The friend by whom she was betrayed and who aided in her murder, is a married man named Plumstead. We copy the following details of this terrible outrage; and we may as well add the melancholy and painful reflection, that the law of Michigan which punishes the crime of seduction, &c., was last winter repealed by a legislature, the members of which, if we may judge from the act, dreaded that the vengeance of the law might be visited upon their own heads:

She has been in Detroit for the last few months, until Saturday the 3d inst., when she left her home with Plumstead, to go on board the steamboat for Toledo, as was supposed by her mother.

Instead, however, of going on the boat they proceeded to Farmington, to this county, arriving at the house of Mrs. Sperry about dark. There they stopped, and Plumstead inquired of Mrs. Sperry if he could leave his wife with her for a few days, until he could go to Livingston county. He said she was tired and unwell, and was very anxious to have her remain. Having obtained the consent of Mrs. Sperry, Plumstead left the girl and drove on towards the west. The diseased, after sitting by the fire a short time, expressed a wish to go to bed, as she was sick. Mrs. Sperry remained up with her during the night, and the next day seeing Dr. Wilson passing, she called him in. The next day she was much worse, and Dr. Wilson was again called. When he arrived, it was evident that the girl was about to be prematurely confined. On Wednesday morning the birth occurred, and when the deceased was left by the physician, she was in as good a situation as could be expected under the circumstances; and so remained until Friday, when inflammation set in, which terminated her existence on Saturday morning.

She gave her name as Sarah Miller, and said that the man who brought her there was her husband. On Saturday she was visited by Plumstead; who remained with her several hours; and when he went away left orders to send for him to Northville if she died.

The examining physicians gave no opinion as to the cause which produced abortion, but said it was by some extraordinary means. They were of opinion that no medicine would of a certainty have that effect, and think the death was caused by taking cold, occasioning inflammation. The verdict of the jury was that the said Caroline Amelia Clarke came to her death by inflammation subsequent to abortion, which was produced by extraordinary means used or administered to or upon said Caroline Amelia Clarke, by some person or persons, for that purpose, to this jury unknown.

Considered in all its circumstances and revolting details; many of which are unfit for publication; it is indisputably the most diabolical and fiendish outrage so far as Plumstead is concerned, which has ever disgraced this or any other civilized community. The deceased was understood to be beautiful and accomplished; enjoying an education superior to that of most young ladies by whom she was surrounded, and up to the time of this fatal dismemberment of her illicit intercourse, both she and her heartless seducer and murderer, (for he can scarcely be looked upon in any other light,) moved in the best society; and enjoyed the respect and esteem of a numerous circle of friends and acquaintances. The scene represented on the arrival of the afflicted mother and sister from Detroit, is said to be heart-rending to the last degree.

The wife of the vile seducer was also present, and with all the elegance and earnestness of woman's confidence and tried affection, protested her husband's innocence, and the impossibility of his having any thing to do in the perpetration of so foul a crime, until her mouth was closed by his confession to her face, that he was indeed the wretch.

Plumstead is still at large, and we are told that there is serious doubt whether he can be convicted of any offence for his known and acknowledged agency in this transaction. It seems to us that the facts disclosed in his own evidence before the coroner's jury, are sufficient to hold him to bail, and we believe the public will not rest satisfied till he is in some manner brought to justice.

THE MISTAKE OF A NIGHT, OR THE DEAF WIDOW.

The following ludicrous story, which we copy from an English paper, might not inaptly be called 'The Mistake of a Night, or the Deaf Widow.' Whether the narrative be true, or even 'founded on fact,' of course we cannot say. It is amusing certainly, and carries with it the moral of 'all well that ends well.'

There dwells in the city of Bath, a very respectable lady, the widow of a dignitary of the church. She is a universal favorite with all the young people who have the pleasure of her intimacy; and no wonder that it is so. The goodness of her heart, the equanimity of her temper, her gay, cheerful disposition, and the grace, ease, and dignity of her manners, although belonging to an old school, render her society more acceptable and agreeable than that of many females having greater advantages in possessing youth and beauty, but destitute of good nature and good breeding. The old lady is, however, a little deaf, and upon a consequence of this infirmity hinges our story. A gallant lieutenant colonel in the service of her most gracious Majesty, was equally celebrated for his devotion to the fair sex, and for his bravery in the field. The fascination of his manners, and the beauty of his person, rendered him a dangerous enemy to the peace of many a fair bosom, but no one ever heard that colonel A.—ever made a serious proposal. In the words of Miss Edgeworth, he was a male jilt, or masculine coquette; but he always so managed matters, that whatever pang he inflicted, he always escaped the expressed indignation of the ladies, and the significant remonstrances of fathers and brothers. Such was colonel A.—when he paid a visit to the renowned city of Bath.

Of course, such a distinguished personage was received with open arms into the best society of such a gay place as the city of King Bladud, but by some accident, he had not had the honor of an introduction to the worthy widow we have mentioned. The gallant colonel commenced in Bath that system of general flirtation he had so successfully practiced elsewhere. In vain the ladies, high, the colonel was not to be had—and he continued his gay career as reckless of the mortification and misery he had caused, as if he had been really an unprincipled man, instead of being unthinking and vain.

Now, our worthy widow gave a ball, to which, of course, all the elite of Bath were invited. To this ball did Col. A.—accompany a friend, though not himself invited, it being understood that the widow would receive the friends without the regular formality of invitations. The colonel looked forward to the pleasure of flirting with half the pretty girls in Bath. Poor man! he little knew what was hanging over his devoted head. As soon as he entered the reception room, a general whisper attested the notoriety or fame of the new comers, and unfortunately two words caught the ear of the widow—'general lover.' The col. and his friend made their way to the lady of the mansion, who was surrounded by a crowd of friends. The gallant officer was introduced, but the widow being deaf, his name did not reach the tympanum of her ear. Judge, if you can, of the colonel's horror when he was addressed as General Lover! The widow belonged to that old school of politeness which considered individual introduction necessary, and General Lover, Mr. Harcourt, Mr. Harcourt, General Lover—General Lover, Miss Harcourt, Miss Harcourt, General Lover—sounded through the room in the widow's clearest, and loudest voice. There was no possibility of mistaking the name. The lady's deafness had become infinitely worse since morning! No explanation could stop her rapid introduction of General Lover to her numerous friends. Not merely human muscles could stand his—a general roar of laughter pervaded the room, and the poor col. broke away from the widow, and rushed from the room in an agony of mortification. From that day colonel A.—craved his flirts, but he was too fine a fellow to be allowed to remain a bachelor, and his wife leaves the day when she made General Lover a Benedict.

THE GOLDEN CLASP.

A modest looking and exceedingly pretty young girl, plainly attired, entered one of the goldsmith's stores on—street, and seeing that a gentleman was engaged with the proprietor, she timidly shrank aside near the door until he should be at leisure. The assistants were also occupied with customers whose dress and appearance showed them to belong to the class of the rich, and so she was suffered to remain for some time standing there before she could be attended to. The gentleman, who was a fine, noble-looking person, with a remarkable polished address, seeing her waiting, courteously stood aside, and said to the goldsmith—

"Do not occupy yourself with me now, Mr. Broochard, I can examine those watches by myself while you see what this young person wants who has been waiting so long and patiently to get an opportunity of addressing you."

And thus speaking the gentleman stood aside from the show case on which he had been leaning, to give the young girl an opportunity of advancing.

"What do you wish, miss?" asked the goldsmith, with a look which conveyed a reproach to her for interrupting him while engaged with a customer of more value to him.

The girl hesitatingly approached the counter, and taking from her bosom a small gold clasp, bent over to him, and said in a low trembling voice—

"I wish, sir, you would be so kind as to keep this a few days and let me have seven dollars on it."

Law as she spoke, her soft, tremulous tones reached the ears of Col. Mac Henry, the gentleman who was present, and he turned to observe her face and hear the reply of the goldsmith to this timid and painfully uttered request. The goldsmith took the clasp scornfully between his fingers, and then throwing it down, said sharply to her—

"This is no pawn broker's shop, girl, and if it was, that thing is not worth two dollars."

"It is of inestimable value to me, sir—indeed it is the only thing valuable I have," answered she, earnestly, and her cheek slightly flushed at the rude manner of his reply.

"I don't know what you value it at," he answered, with a cold laugh, glancing at Col. Mac Henry, whom he thought he saw severely observing him; "I would not like to give you six shillings for it."

"But, sir," plead the girl, unconscious of being overheard, "I must have seven dollars to-day, and I have no other way of getting it, and I was in hopes, sir, that you might let me have that sum on it; for I certainly will come back and take it up again."

"I tell you," answered Mr. Broochard, angrily, "I keep no pawnbroker's shop. Go to the Jew!"

"They won't give me but two dollars, sir, and I want seven!"

"And so you think to get it out of me? The young girl was about to speak

THE NEIGHBOR.

We insert the following communications, not that we agree with the writers altogether, but to give all sides a chance to make known their sentiments, that the public may judge for themselves and act accordingly. We would suggest the necessity of unanimity, after weighing the matter over, and fixing on the man the best calculated to represent their interests in Congress, for it can answer no good purpose that half the citizens should disfranchise the other half, thus rendering Nauvoo powerless as far as politics are concerned. In this city we have one interest alone and should not be divided, for we think that every man must have concluded in his own mind after having heard the two candidates express their sentiments so explicitly. We understand that President H. Smith intends to address the citizens on Saturday evening, at four o'clock, at the grove, near the temple.

(For the Neighbor.)

Next Monday will be a proud day for the Democracy of Illinois. On that day we can exercise the high privilege of the elective franchise—a privilege bought by the blood of our forefathers, and guaranteed to us by the Constitution and laws of the country. Much depends upon the right and judicious exercise of that privilege, as to the perpetuity of the fair temple of our liberties. Before depositing our votes in the ballot box, let us calmly and dispassionately weigh the merits and principles of the two men aspiring for a seat in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. HOGE is a man governed alone by principle—scorns the idea of trucking, or playing the sycophant to obtain your votes. He is independent, bold and fearless in the advocacy of his principles. In him we have a sure guaranty that our rights will be protected. He comes heroically declaring that we are his fellow citizens—and constitute a respectable portion of his constituents—having an equal claim upon his services, should he be elected; and as a faithful servant, ever ready to protect our rights when infringed on, as he would all or any portion of his constituents. What more, then, can you ask of him? Nothing more.

Who is CYRUS WALKER? He is a Federal Whig politician, and is anything to obtain your votes. What reasons have you to support him?

Is it because he is in favor of a National Bank? The bills of which your city ordinances declare shall not be circulated within the limits of the city.

Is it because he is in favor of a high protective tariff, to tax the labor and sweat of your brow to build up manufactures in the east—protecting one class of citizens to the exclusion of the great mass of the people?

Is it because he is in favor of giving away $3,000,000 of the land fund to the States, when we have a bankrupt treasury, thereby affording an excuse to tax the people to that amount, from whom it must be collected?

Is it because he is in favor of the union of the purse and the sword, by repealing the Independent Treasury Bill, and providing nothing for its substitute?

Is it because he supports an administration that violated all pledges made to the people in 1840?

Is it because he pleaded as a Lawyer for Joseph Smith at Monmouth, in 1840, and received a fee for his services?

Is it because he defended Joseph Smith in his late arrest, as a Lawyer, and obtained Five Hundred Dollars for his services?

Is it because he never rendered any services for Joseph Smith gratuitously?

Is it because he voted for, and supported Joseph Duncan for Governor at the last election, knowing him to be at the same time running on the anti-Mormon ticket, as an avowed and open enemy of the Mormons and their interests?

Fellow citizens, this last charge applies with double force to Mr. Walker, for he says himself he was solicited to become a candidate for Governor; but would not. He preferred to support old Jo Duncan, your enemy—who declared, too, if elected, he would repeal your city Charter; and if in his power, to crush and exterminate you, as did old Biggs in Missouri. Can or will you support any man who supported the man avowing those principles? Not you are not so lost to a just sense of your duty. You will arise in your straight next Monday, and teach all such men, and their supporters, that you are not to be gulled, and duped by fair promises now into their support. But the day of remembrance has come; when you will reward them for their past votes, by voting against all men who gave such a vote.

Then, Freemen, to the polls! to the polls! Assert your rights, and maintain inviolate your principles. Suffer yourselves not to be led astray by the siren songs of Whiggery, or any of the satellites of Jo Duncan. Unfurl the flag of Democracy freely to the breeze, inscribed on its ample folds, Equal Rights, and Equal Privileges—JOSEPH P. HOGE, now and forever.

CYRUS WALKER.
Cyrus Walker is most unquestionably the man that should be supported for Congress, at the ensuing August election. In him the interests and welfare of our government are deeply rooted, and in his heart they will ever find a hearty welcome, until the chronicles of time shall register his name among the paler nations of the earth. The past is frequently the best history of the present. And in investigating the rights or claims of Cyrus Walker and Joseph P. Hoge to the suffrages of this community, a reference to the past is of the utmost importance, without the claims of the above named statesman might, to many, seem to be equal, but more particularly to those who are not the slaves of either party. Cyrus Walker is a man of stability, a man in the full enjoyment of fixed and established principles. Age and experience have written on the tabernacle of his heart the purest principles of right. He is a man 50 years of age, with an experience as a lawyer of thirty years, and that experience has been such as has already secured to him a name that shall live when all else shall slumber. In Cyrus Walker, the innocent and oppressed have found a balm, and justice demands that it should be reciprocated. His gigantic and stately mind, his homespun, yet commanding appearance are pearls more precious than the golden diamonds of Golconda, or the richest pearl of the Indian ocean. He is kind, conciliating and courteous in his address, easy and gentle in his manners, but when the innocent are oppressed, or any of those sacred rights trodden under foot, guaranteed to us by the constitution of our country, he will stretch forth his omnipotent arm in their defence, and upon those who dare to dispute the fact, rest the onus probandi. Fellow citizens, is Cyrus Walker worthy your support? Let the first Monday in August, forty three-hundred and thirty-three, be a day of peace and brotherly love, that the great architect may deeply sink the same in the tomb stones of Democracy.

As it regards Joseph P. Hoge I shall decline making any remark, from the fact that I am totally ignorant of his political, religious, or military career; Mr. Hoge seems to be a gentleman, and a young man of fine talent, but most certainly his experience can in no wise cope with the gray hairs of Cyrus Walker. And now, fellow citizens, on next Monday prove true to yourselves, formidable to your enemies, and faithful to your afflicted and bleeding country. A. K.

We have purposed making some general remarks in relation to the Missouri persecution in connection with the trial, but the inquiry of that State is so fully and clearly developed in the testimony given, and the corruption, lawlessness, and abomination so fully made known, that further remarks would be superfluous. "He that runneth may read."

We have received news by our English papers bearing date July 3d. These papers arrived here the 30th of last month. Thus a distance of near seven thousand miles has been performed in 27 days, this brings our transatlantic brethren to a close relationship to us. There is nothing very important in the news.

Ireland still remains in a state of commotion. There is nothing very different to what we have already stated.

The Cylops, war steamer, with the Radamanthus and Lightning, have been employed in carrying troops. Admiral Bowes has hoisted his flag on board the Malabar, in the cove of Cork. The vessels in that harbor are the Malabar, 72; the Orestus, 18; the Racer, 16; the Scylla; the Tyre, and the Lightning steamers. It is supposed by some that this array of war steamers in the Cove of Cork, although ostensibly for preserving peace in Ireland, is intended and destined for some other contemplated design, not yet made known.

ALLEGED MURDER.

A rumor has been very busily circulated here this last week, that a man was killed by Thomas Clark, by a scythe, in a quarrel about some hay or newly cut grass. We are happy to be informed that no such circumstance ever transpired. Mr. Clark is a very quiet, peaceable, inoffensive man, and never had any quarrel with, hard feelings against, nor the least mention to injure said King, who is now living, and in good health.

It would seem that some person, intending mischief, met another with a scythe and asked him if he knew Mr. Clark. He told him that he did. He then said that he had just killed a man with a scythe, mentioning his name. From the rumor was put in circulation. Such things ought not to be. Men ought to be cautious how they tamper with the characters of men and with public feeling. If men must have jokes, they ought to joke on some other subject.

In justice to Mr. Clark, whom we know to be a peaceable, inoffensive man, we publish the above.

A mother and her five children equal murdered.—By an extra from the office of the Butler Herald, we learn that a most shocking and brutal murder was committed in Slippery Rock township, Butler county, on Saturday morning, the 1st inst. The following are the particulars of this horrible tragedy:

James Wigton had left his house early in the morning for the purpose of going to his father's to borrow from him a horse to plough corn, leaving his wife and five children at home. While he was absent, an Indian came there, and, as appears from his confession, murdered Mrs. Wigton and her five children by beating out their brains with stones. Mrs. Wigton and the youngest child were not quite dead when first discovered. The Indian then proceeded to a Mr. Kennedy's house, and made an attack on him and his family, injuring a son of Mr. Kennedy very severely, perhaps dangerously, by hitting him on the head with a large stone. After being driven off by Mr. Kennedy, he next went to Mr. Keiser's, where he was captured after a desperate resistance, in which a man named Blair was seriously injured. He was taken to Wigton's and confessed the murder, and said he was sorry for it.

Mrs. Wigton was about thirty-five years of age; the children, three girls and two boys, were aged about eleven, nine, five, three and one year.

The Indian is now in jail, and will be tried at the September sessions. We understand that he lives in Cattaraugus County, N. Y.

Distress at Fall River.—We make the following extract from a letter to a commercial house of this city, dated Fall River, July 7, 1843. It gives a picture of great distress, which we feel confident the good feeling and benevolence of the people of this country will prompt them to alleviate:

I am not to my knowledge an individual sufferer to a large amount; but the scene of desolation around me is heart-rending indeed. We say to those distressed friends, come to us and we will divide even the last shingle over our heads, the last garment to our backs, and the last morsel of bread. Many of us have our houses filled with those who have been less fortunate than ourselves. Persons who a few days since had a good house, and the smile of contentment in their midst, are now without a second suit to cover their nakedness. But as kind hearts and open hands are among us, we presume therefore the bodily suffering will not be great; though if your eyes, or any friends you may be pleased to ask in our behalf may be desirous, under the circumstances, to aid us, we will feel thankful and grateful, and doubtless our Heavenly Father's smile will attend the offering. Respectfully yours, J. R.

P. S. I presume the loss will be little short of a half million of dollars. Baltimore American.

CIRCULAR.

To their fellow citizens, near and remote, both in town and country, the undersigned, a committee in behalf of the people of Fall River, Massachusetts, making their brief appeal for help, amid the appalling calamity, which under the wise and righteous Providence of God has overtaken us. Our population, from 8000 to 9000 souls, and chiefly devoted to manufactures and mechanic pursuits, is in deep distress—a portion of it in pressing want.

At 4 o'clock P. M., last Sabbath, the 2d inst., a fire broke out in a central part of this village, (the wind was blowing a gale,) which, in its ravages, was of the most desolating character.

The burned district comprises some fifteen or twenty acres of the centre of business operations. Nearly 200 buildings, not including many small ones, are consumed; among which are three newly built houses of public worship and all our offices. Our post office and custom house are gone, and we have not a printing office, nor hotel, nor bank building, nor book store, nor market, nor bakery left. Nearly all our grocery and provision stores, including one wholesale establishment, with most of their contents; and all our dry goods, druggist, tailor, milliner, tin ware and paint shops, with one cotton factory, running 3000 spindles, are gone. Nearly 200 families are turned homeless, and many of them penniless, into the street. Besides, this appalling fire raged with such fury, and spread with such velocity, that many of the sufferers gladly escaped with their lives, without a pillow for their heads, or a change of raiment for their backs. The amount of property consumed it is impossible to estimate, even by anything like a probable approximation.

The assessors of the town, in the discharge of their official duties, within the last two months, have rated the property of the place at three and a half millions of dollars—and the heart of this village is in ashes. We cannot, we need not enlarge. We tell you in a few words, the simple, sad story of our calamity—and with this scene of desolation before us, and the cries of distress around us, we ask your aid. In behalf of our suffering neighbors—and in the name of humanity and of our Heavenly Father, we appeal to your kindness and your love, not to repair our losses and rebuild our village, but to relieve our present distress, and enable us to give bread to the hungry, clothing to the naked, and shelter to the homeless, until with due effort on the part of all among us, a merciful and righteous God, who has justly afflicted us, shall command the hum of business, the smile of contentment, and the song of joy to return to our now desolate burials. Send us what you can—food, clothing, money; send it addressed to either of us and it shall be carefully distributed to the needy.

MORE REPORTED GREAT FIRE.—A postscript to the Providence Chronicle, of the 5th inst., says:

"We learn, just as we are going to press, that there has been a most destructive fire at Plymouth. No particulars have been furnished us. Should we obtain anything it will be given in a second edition."

"Since writing the above, we have seen a gentleman direct from Dighton, Massachusetts. He tells us that there was a report in that place that the fire in Marshpee woods [to which we alluded yesterday, and the strong light which was seen here day before yesterday evening] and yesterday morning had extended to Wareham and Plymouth—that about forty houses in the first had been destroyed, and one half of the latter."

Mike, and it is yourself that can be after telling me how they make ice creams? In truth I can; do they bake them in cow-dung to be sure?

To the Editor of the Neighbor.

Mr. Editor,—Knowing your paper was open to the truth on all subjects, I thought that it might not be uninteresting to your readers abroad to know something of the doings in "the beloved city." I therefore send you the following communication, and by inserting which you will oblige ONE OF THE OLDEN TIMES.

On Saturday last Mr. Joseph P. Hoge, democratic candidate for Congress, addressed the citizens of this place according to previous notice. He was listened to by a large and respectable portion of the citizens for near three hours. He enchaind and rivetted their attention to an array of facts and arguments that were perfectly irresistible.

He took a brief review of the political history of the country—showed the ruin and devastation that had been inflicted upon the people by the Banks of the country. He then adverted to the Tariff, and gave his views in opposition to it, showing the evils and iniquity of the system. He showed the absurdity of distributing the land fund among the States, when we had a bankrupt treasury, that it was held out as a bribe to the indebted States. But said he, I trust that the people are not like cattle in the market, to be bought and sold by a few designing politicians. His remarks upon the promises and performances of the whig party was truly withering and sarcastic.

He boldly proclaimed his principles, that no man could be in doubt as to what they were. He evinced a nobleness of soul and independence of spirit, that characterize him as a patriot and philanthropist. In him are combined all the qualities that render him well worthy our support.

In the conclusion of his able, eloquent and unanswerable address, a letter was handed him containing some queries, which related to the people of Nauvoo. He answered them freely, frankly and boldly, to the satisfaction of every unprejudiced mind. He showed no trucking and double dealing in order to catch votes.

Mr. Walker then made a few remarks; and endeavored to cast the impression on that he had sought Mr. Hoge, to speak with him through the district, but he had avoided him. This was a matter in which the people had nothing to do. But is there a sane man that ever heard the two speak, really believe that Hoge has anything to lose by appealing with him. Then what a silly charge.

On Tuesday evening Mr. Walker, continued the discussion in answer to Mr. Hoge. He prefaced his address with a piteous cry of what he should use by his defence of Joseph Smith, and what Mr. Hoge, would gain, therefore he thought the people of Nauvoo ought to support him. But he forgot to explain why he voted for Jo Duncan for Governor, an open hostile enemy of the Mormons. He was as silent as the tomb of the silent dead upon this subject. He advocated all the leader's whig measures, and said he was a democratic whig! Why a democratic whig in the east would be worth a quarter a sight. To cap the climax of all, he claimed to be a Jackson democrat!!! He certainly presumed more upon the ignorance and credulity of the people than any man I ever saw, or else he must be ignorant himself.

He continued his address until sunset, when Mr. Hoge arose and replied in a strain of eloquence, for about two hours, that completely demolished the whole superstructure erected by Mr. Walker. Though the night was cool, candles were lighted, and the people patiently listened to Mr. Hoge until about nine o'clock. He was frequently stopped with the shouts of applause. He has won for himself golden opinions. All who heard Mr. H. accord to him the merit of an eloquent speaker, and a giant intellect, and that he is an honest, honorable and high minded man. With him as our representative, we may feel proud. We know that our rights will be protected. Judge ye between the two, and on Monday next you will record your votes for JOSEPH P. HOGE.

again, but as if not knowing what further argument to urge hesitated, and was turning slowly away, when she checked herself, and again spoke to him—

Sir, she said, in a low, thrilling voice of earnest entreaty, my mother is lying very ill, and our rent is due at twelve o'clock to day, and the persons we see for having disappointed us in our pay, I have no resource but this! Oh, sir, will you take the clasp, only for a few days, and I will then repay you?

Mr. Broochard felt that Col. MacHenry's eyes were upon him, waiting an answer, and as he wished him to think him a man of business, (which meant in his notion a man without a heart,) he answered promptly and sternly. No. Do you think we are simpletons here to throw away money in this way. If you have nothing more to say, please to stand aside for other customers. Well, Colonel, what do you think of those watches? Latest importation—full jeweled, and warranted in all points. I will sell you the one you just laid down for one hundred and ninety five dollars.

The gentleman, however, was not heeding him, but watching the young girl whom he saw leave the counter, and with a heavy, drooping step approach the door. Her face had struck him for its sweet intelligent loveliness, and her modesty had for him an irresistible charm; but her plea of poverty, and her eloquent appeal to the tradesman, deeply interested his feelings and enlisted his sympathies in her behalf. He had silently observed the progress of her interview with him, with emotions of contempt for the one, and pity for the other.

Her hand was upon the knob of the door, when, advancing toward her—

You asked, I believe, for seven dollars? he said, with a gentle interest in his tones that at once awakened hope in her heart, and brought the light to her eyes, and the hue to her cheeks, as she diffidently answered.

Yes, sir. I would not have been so bold and urgent but—

Non? too much so. There is a ten dollar note; I have no smaller bills. And he placed it in her hand.

Sir, you are too kind—

Not a word. I am happy to do you a service.

Take the clasp, sir; though I am ashamed to offer it to you, since the gentleman says it is so valuable. But to me it is as valuable as life, and I foolishly thought it must be so with others.

I do not want it, child, answered Colonel MacHenry, feelingly, putting the hand aside which urged it upon him.

Indeed, sir, you must take it, for I shall fall in some degree less under obligation to a stranger. Besides, I wish to call and redeem it. Will you give me your address, sir? and as she spoke, he still declining the jewel, she laid it upon the show-case.

Oh, no matter—but if you insist—the United States Hotel?

Thank you, sir; you can never know the blessings to others that will follow your kindness to me to-day. Thus speaking and looking upon him with an expression of gratitude in her tearful eyes she left the shop, forgetting the golden clasp, which she had left upon the show-case.

Will you look at one of these watches now, Colonel MacHenry? superciliously asked the goldsmith, without lifting his condemned eyes.

No, sir; answered the gentleman sternly. And taking his gloves and cane from the counter, he left the shop of the avaricious and unfeeling goldsmith, who, too close to risk a trifle to relieve the wants of a poor family, probably lost a large amount by the purchase of his wealthy customer might have made, as well as his own self-respect, such as it was: for avarice always shrinks into its shell before the broad sun of benevolence.

Now there goes a man who throws away money upon vagrants, and thinks me beneath him, because I keep mine to support my family, said the goldsmith, looking after him. He thinks me a miser, and I think him a fool. Oh, here is that clasp after all! She left it for him on the show-case, and he was too proud to take it away, if he saw it. Seven dollars! It is not worth more than five!

He opened it as he spoke, and taking up a sharp instrument, tries the fineness of the gold.

It is good old Mexican gold. It might have cost once twenty dollars. Ah! what a star of diamonds within it! he exclaimed, as, in working about it with the point of the steel, he discovered a cavity. Twelve large diamonds of the purest water! This is indeed valuable! Let me see—they are worth at least five hundred dollars! what a fortunate discovery! The girl knew the value to ask so much! no, no, she could not, either for she would not have let it go for so small a sum, or else asked far nearer its value. I suspect she was ignorant of its cavity, which I detected only by accident. She has probably stolen it, and will never come for it. Ah, ah, Abraham Broochard, thou hast made a good morning's work of it! he said, exultingly, to himself.

Then looking round among his shop boys, to see if he were unobserved, he carefully, yet with a careless air, locked the clasp in his private drawer, and taking out the key placed it in his pocket. He had hardly done so when Colonel MacHenry re-entered, and without speaking or even looking at him, cast his eyes on the show-case for the clasp, which he recollected, after going out, the young girl had laid down but did not take up again, and so he turned back for it. Abraham Broochard was very busily engaged in replacing the watches in their doe-skin coverings, and preserved silence and ignurance. At length Colonel MacHenry spoke.

That young person laid her clasp on the case, sir, which I neglected to take up. It was a pity, she valued it so highly, it should be lost.

The clasp! oh, oh! I have not seen it, sir. She took it up again.

Did you see her?

Yes, oh yes! I had my eyes on her, and said at the time you'd never see your ten dollars or the clasp again.

The gentleman eyed him steadily an instant, and then glancing round the show-case again, as if in search of it, he quit the shop.

Several days elapsed, and Colonel MacHenry had quite forgotten the circumstances just narrated, when, as he was passing down Arch street, he felt his sleeve suddenly pulled by some one whom he had heard running behind him, and looking round he beheld, with a cheek glowing from the pursuit, the young girl he had seen in the goldsmith's.

Oh, sir, I am so happy to have found you, she said, at once addressing him, as he stopped and with pleasure listened to her. I was at length enabled to get my pay, and by other work have earned enough to repay you the ten dollars you so kindly gave me. You don't know the good you did, sir—the suffering you relieved—the evil your timely aid averted. Here is the money, sir.

Nay, my good girl, I do not want it. I made you a present of it at the time and did not expect you to return it. I am however glad to find you have had the disposition to do so, and that I was not deceived in my estimation of you.

You must take it, sir, she said with ingenious earnestness. I should be distressed to be longer under pecuniary obligation to an entire stranger. Besides, sir, I would like my clasp, if you please.

Did you not take it from the case where you laid it down? he asked, with surprise and justly directed suspicion.

No, sir; indeed, sir, I hope it is not lost. It is of countless value to me. It was given me by—

By a sweetheart? he added smiling.

He is now—dead, sir, she answered with overflowing eyes.

You do well to value it. I did not take it up. Are you sure you left it there?

Yes sir; hoping you would take it and keep it till I paid you.

Well, my child, I have not got it; but I believe the goldsmith has. Let us go to him.

On their arrival, Mr. Broochard denied ever having seen it since she went out, and that he saw her take it with her and place it in her bosom as she left the shop. The young lady turned pale, and was unconsciously distressed.

Come with me! I will find the clasp for you, said Colonel MacHenry, offering her his arm and leaving the goldsmith's with her.

I do hope I shall find it, sir, she said, as they walked; it was Robert's last dying gift. It was given him in Cuba by a rich lady whose life he had saved by rescuing her from the water. He was a sailor, sir, and had little to leave me but his memory, and my poor clasp. Oh, sir, if it is lost I shall never forgive myself for offering to pledge it. But, sir, our extremity was very great.

Colonel MacHenry stopped with her at a justice's office, and briefly and clearly made his complaint, and in a few minutes Mr. Abraham Broochard was brought by an officer into the presence of a magistrate. He appeared to be in great trepidation, and was pale as ashes; for he had been suddenly taken without warning from behind his counter, leaving his shop in the charge of his astonished assistants. Col. MacHenry and the young lady being sworn, deposed that they both had last seen the clasp on the show-case, where each went out and left it; the latter further deposing that he had not gone three steps from the door before he returned and found it missing, and no one in the vicinity but the defendant.

The goldsmith was then called up to be sworn as to his knowledge of the facts.—He approached the stand, where the magistrate held the Bible, and laid his hands upon it with a perceptible tremor of his whole body; but the love of money was stronger than the fear of the law, and he took the oath. It appeared as if he would have sunk through the floor when he did it; but the moment it was done he recovered his audacity. At this moment an officer who, at the suggestion of Colonel MacHenry, had been privately despatched by the justice with a search-warrant to the shop of the goldsmith, now entered and placed something in the magistrate's hand, after briefly whispering to him.

Did you ever see this gold ornament before? asked the magistrate, holding up the clasp before the young girl.

Oh, it is my clasp—it is my clasp! she cried, springing forward.

Yes—it is the same; answered Colonel MacHenry.

And did you ever see it before, sir? demanded the justice, sternly, holding it in the direction of the goldsmith, who had seen it at the first, and was appalled with fear and consternation. Instead of replying, he uttered a wild hysterical laugh, and fell his length in convulsions upon the floor.

He was, a few weeks afterwards, taken from prison, tried and condemned for perjury; but his reason forsook him, and instead of the gallows, he was now raging in a mad-house. Thus was avarice and parsimony, and indifference to the sufferings of others published in this life; the acts of this selfish man showing to all, how that acquisitiveness wrongly directed is fatal to its possessor.

Whether Colonel MacHenry was a bachelor and married his young friend

A Droll Subject.—The Picayune tells the following:
There was a droll subject, an Irishman, up before the Criminal Court yesterday, on the charge of having in his possession forged notes, knowing them to be counterfeit.

Do you know your rights? said the judge.

Not so well as I do my wrongs, said he; for we haven't been such intimate acquaintances of late.

Well, you have the right to challenge the twelve men who will be called up to try you, said the judge.

Pon me sowl, thin, said the prisoner, I'm not goin' to exercise it—I d—n a one—but that's a nice job you'd be after given me this morning; to challenge and fight them—one down and another come on, I suppose. Oh! no, you can't come it, judge!

The jury acquitted him, more for drollery than for the clearness of his case, we believe.

CURE FOR HARD TIMES.

The editor of the Belfast Signal has given a prescription in the following paragraph for the cure of hard times, which cannot be otherwise than effectual. From first to last it is a personal matter, and each man must attend to his own cure.

"Drive all drones and loafers and unemployed men into some useful business or work—bring down salaries to the level with other things at the time being—reduce professional fees—be careful of health, that no time be lost by sickness—buy what is absolutely necessary, and pay for it down—rise early—work steadily, live prudently, wear your own clothes yourself, as long as they will do to wear; pay every dollar you owe, if you possibly can do it—buy what is raised or made in your town, county or state, rather than what is imported, and thus keep all the money in circulation in your midst that you can—live honestly with yourself—your fellow men, and your God—and when you do all these things, the times will improve."

SHERMAN'S MEDICATED LOZENGES. THESE celebrated Lozenges are now offered to the citizens of Nauvoo and the West, as the best preparation (for the cure of the various diseases) for which they are recommended ever offered to the public. The proprietor, Dr. Sherman, is a regular graduate of Medicine, a member of the Medical Society of the city and county of New York, and these Lozenges are prepared from medical prescriptions which have been approved by the most celebrated physicians in that city; in addition to which they are prepared in so pleasant a manner that children eat them with avidity and civ for more. They consist of COUGH LOZENGES. Which are the safest and most effectual remedy for Coughs, Colds, Consumption, Whooping Cough, Asthma, &c., ever offered to the public. They operate by promoting expectoration, allaying the irritation of coughing, and removing the cause of the disease.

WORM LOZENGES. The only infallible Worm medicine ever discovered. In over 400,000 cases they have never been known to fail. Many diseases arise from worms and occasion long and intense suffering and even death without their ever being suspected; grown persons are very often afflicted with them, and are doctored for various complaints, without any benefit, when one dose of these Lozenges would speedily cure them.

CATHARTIC LOZENGES. For Nervous or Sick Head Ache, Palpitations of the Heart, Insults and nervous affections generally. Persons traveling or attending large parties, will find the Lozenges really reviving, and imparting the buoyancy of youth—used after dinner, they will restore the tone of the system generally, and remove all the unpleasant symptoms arising from too free living.

FEVER AND AGUE LOZENGES. These Lozenges have been tested by a celebrated physician in a practice of twenty years, and have never been known to fail in removing the distressing disease. In addition to which, if the directions be followed, the disease will not return.

SHERMAN'S POOR MAN'S PLASTER. This Plaster, of which over 1,000,000 are sold yearly, is believed to be the best Plaster for rheumatism, lumbago, pain in the back, side, breast or any other part of the body, ever prepared, and its price (only 12 1/2 cents) brings it within the reach of every person in the community.

CONTENTS.

From the N. York Tribune.
A TALE OF A COMET.

From a Letter to a Gentleman in this City from a Lady in Virginia.

'Tis evening, and deep in the glowing West
The Sun sinks down to his golden rest,
And the cloudless vault of celestial blue
Looks the same with us as it does with you.
For stars in the evening are wont to appear
In the North, "I reckon," as well as here;
That is to say, if the sky is clear.

Be that as it may,
I have nothing to say,
But proceed with my tale in a straight-forward way.

Well, then, as I told you above, the Sun
Was taking a snooze when his work was done,
And the Planets all, as in duty bound,
Were rolling around
With a pleasant round,
To make the great Potentate's nap more profound.

Whether their music was merry or sad,
Or "exquisitely good," or "decidedly bad,"
Or made up of contralto, or tenor, or bass,
Can only be known in the depths of space.

Suffice it to say,
They sang on their way;
At least so the learned astronomers say.

'Tis nine of the clock, and a shooting Star Gives note of the hour to worlds afar;
'Tis nine of the clock, and a steady snore,
Like waves on the shore,
Still louder and deeper,
Proceeds from the nose of the royal sleeper.

When hark! from without Comes a distant shout,
And a mighty sound through the blue profound,
A rushing and crushing,
And smashing and pushing,
As if all the Planets had got by the ears,
And were pushing each other clean out of their spheres.

And Mercury hastened, with fear on his brow,
To announce to the Monarch the cause of the row.

"Most Potent and Luminous!—haste, arise,
A stranger Comet of fearful size
Is making tracks through our western skies!
And if we don't stop him, by this and that,
We'll be presently knocked into a cocked hat.
Another planet is tossed from her sphere,
And the rest of the waters are quaking with fear;

And had not Orion dodged and missed him,
He, too, had been lost to the Solar System."

The Sun uprose with mighty frown,
And put on his flame-colored dressing-gown;
His seat he took,
With a fiery look,

And he hung his night-cap upon a hook:
"By Jupiter, Venus and all the crew!
This pestilent Comet shall dearly rue Disturbing us thus
With his noise and fuss.

Friend Mercury! roll, like a veteran eager,
And bring to our presence our Ursa Major;
And summon our Councilors every one:
There must something be done
With this sun of a gun,
Or in some of his frolics he'll knock out the Sun."

While thus, over head, all is fear and dismay,
On our own mighty Planet the deuce is to pay:
For the tail of this Comet, 'tis said by some,
Is to carry us all to kingdom come,
Without so much as a "by your leave,"
To sinners who doubt, or to saints who believe,
And balls and routs are quite at a stand,
And Bibles and Prayer-books in great demand:
And Churches are rising, and Temples falling,
And the signs of the times are truly appalling.

The chosen saints
Are making up linen,
And wicked old sinners
Have given up sinning;
And terrestrial orbs are upraised to spy
Their sister sparklers that deck the sky;
And roses Roman, and Grecian, and hook,
And noses that crook
Have a turn-up look,
And pugs are decidedly on the rise.

Swift and more swift, the Comet's flight,
And his fiery tail, each succeeding night,
Adds new fears to the wild affright;
For dark and dread
The rumor has spread
That the end of the world, by researches profound,
Although by Astronomers deemed to be round,
The great Pastor Miller has certainly found.
And, wo and distraction!
He proves to a fraction
The before-mentioned end will undoubtedly be In the year Eighteen Hundred and Forty-Three.
I grieve to say there's an opposition
To the holy Miller's divine commission:
Obstinate sinners who will not see That the thing is as plain as the Rule of Three.

But who potest in doubting,
And utterly scouting
Both the holy man and his prophesy.

The Court of the Sun sits in solemn state,
And the Planets assemble, little and great,
While high in the midst, with a sullen glare,
The Monarch looks forth from his easy-chair.

'Tis plain to see
That a regular spree
Awaits the Comet's delinquency;
For nothing in Heaven, the Earth or the deep,
Makes a body so mad as the loss of sleep.

At Mercury's summons, the rebel appears
Before the Sun and his silent spheres;
That is to say, his head is there,
But his latter end is, the Lord knows where.
'Comet, erratic, rebellious and rash,
For your peevish treason
Canst show any reason Why we shall not immediately settle your hash?

Forgetting the rules of polite decorum,
Invading our sacred sanctum sanctorum,
And poking of heavenly bodies about,— Speak—Does your mother know you're out?"

Now every one knows, but especially noddies,
That Comets are hasty and hot-headed bodies,
And our Comet in this
Was by no means amiss.

But then he had travelled the System through,
And learned in his travels a thing or two;
So he smothered his rage, but his distant tail
Was heard thrashing about like a giant flail.

At length he said:
"Your Majesty speaks without rhyme or reason,
I scorn the thought of committing treason;
And as to my mother, I have no doubt
She is fully aware of my being out.
I merely came to assist friend Miller,
Of the Church on earth a tremendous pillar;
A dealer in prophecies, signs and wonders,
And a patron of earthquakes, storms and thunders;

Volcanic eruptions he has by the score,
And dire tornadoes, a dozen or more,
With other combustibles stored away,
To make a faze on the final day!
And now, having nearly completed the batch,
He wants my tail for a patent match."

"Yes!" roared the Sun, in a voice of thunder,
"Our very beams he has dared to plunder:
We'll hear no more
On the villain's score.

And, Mercury, show that Comet the door,
We banish him from our royal sight
To the gloomy regions of polar night:
Should he again in his duty fail,
And join with the Millerites—off with his tail!
Break up the Council; we're off to bed,
Whoever disturbs us shall lose his head.
Let Aurora call us precisely at seven,
And sweep all the clouds from the face of heaven.

We mean to shine out in our brightest glow
To the eyes of the Millerites down below,
And convince the people of every degree
That no mortal can fathom Futurity.

Though the end of the world is a problem still,
And remain a problem it probably will,
This thought to console you can scarce fail,
You have certainly got to the end of my tale;
And as you are weary, and I no less,
The moral it teaches "I leave you to guess."

PAUL PLIANT.

(Concluded)

The next day Paul's adventure was the talk of the town, and the congratulations and condolence which he received from his friends on his engagement to the widow Willif, almost drove him stark mad. "Paul, my dear fellow I give you joy—but who would have thought you had the courage to do it?"
—Paul, How could you do such a thing?—Paul, I wish you much happiness; but widows are such cunning things! "Paul it's all over with you, then!" &c. Such were the salutation to which he was subjected for a week or, for nine days; for so long must wonder be allowed to last, especially when it gives a privilege to a man to remind him of his misfortunes. As to enjoying the thing, that, of course, was out of the question with Paul, besides hadn't a whole house full of people seen him on his knees before the widow? and did not the whole town at-firm that it was certainly a match?— Paul gave up in despair all thoughts of gainsaying or denial, and only hoped that some lucky accident would pop in between him and the dreadful catastrophe.

"Well, Paul, my coquering hero when is to be the happy day?" asked his friend Tom Sly, with a look compounded with roguish sarcasm and good-natured concern.

"O yes, a very happy day it will be certainly," replied Paul, shrugging up his shoulders.

"Pretty soon, I suppose."

"Oh yes—soon enough, no doubt of that, eh?"

"Left it all pretty much to her, eh?"
Well that's quite right—women love to have their own way, hey, Paul?"
"Exactly so, as you say," replied
Paul, with a half suppressed groan.

"The widow is certainly a fine woman," said Tom, with an almost malicious look of condolence.

Paul made a very low bow, and a very desperate attempt to look smiling at the compliment.

"Had a husband three years ago—died one day, poor man!"

"What ailed him?" said Paul, wishing to turn the conversation, but feeling at the same time an awkward sort of interest in the topic.

"They say she pinched him to death."

"Horrid!" exclaimed Paul, with an involuntary shudder.

"Though I don't altogether believe it," returned Tom, in a tone as if he only said it to comfort his friend Paul.

It was a great deal than if he had said nothing at all; but probably this was just the thing he meant.

"Thank ye," said Paul with an air of dolorous resignation.

Here they were interrupted by the entrance of Colonel Strut. More friendly congratulations, I suppose, thought Paul to himself, in a heroic resignation.

"I believe I have the honor to address Mr. Paul Pliant," said the Colonel, marching with stately port, and in a double quick time, up to Paul and planting himself bolt upright before us face.

"At your service, entirely," said
Paul, with meek and measured civility.

"And Mr. Pliant, I presume," continued the Colonel, making half a bow, and screwing up his martial features into an apology for a smile, "is to marry the widow Willif?"

"Oh yes, certainly—that is—so they say."

"Then sir, I have only to say," said the Colonel, lifting himself up as high as possible, and twisting his fore finger into one of his formidable big black whiskers, "that considering myself supplanted, beguiled, and circumvented by you, I apprehend you are ready to give me such satisfaction as the laws of honor shall require?"

"Certainly, sir, with great pleasure," replied Paul.

"Then sir I shall desire the pleasure of your company on the other side of the State line," returned the Colonel in the quickest tone possible. "Pistols,
I suppose would be your preference?"

"Pistols?" said Paul, in a tone which he meant for an ejaculation of surprise.

"Very well," said the Colonel, without giving time for any further explanation. "Here are the terms of meeting, which I trust you will find perfectly agreeable." So saying, he handed a paper to Paul, who received it, and an it over with his eyes, without having self-possession enough to gather the meaning of a particle of its contents.

"Perfectly agreeable, certainly," said
Paul, in his usual assenting way. "The Colonel turned upon his heel, and stalked off.

Paul's good friend Tom snatched up the document, and read—Pistols—ten
A. M.—thirty paces, seconds to mark out the ground—no interference till bird shot—surgeons for two, mortally wounded, &c."

"Why, Paul, do you know you are to fight a duel?"

"Am I?" said Paul, "then Heaven be praised, there is still a hope left:
for if I am shot to death, I shall escape
narrying the widow!"

When Paul arrived at the field of action on the eventful day, he found his spirits a great deal firmer than he had expected. In fact he felt inspired by the greatness of the occasion, and very naturally, for when a man knows he must either be shot or married, he must be aware that the crisis requires all his fortitude. Paul took his station, with the most bloodless intention that ever prompted a man of battle. "I had much rather be killed than kill," thought he.

"One—two—three," said the seconds, as Paul raised his pistol to about forty-seven degrees of elevation.—
"Fire!" bang! The Colonel's bullet whistled by Paul's left ear, and Paul's at the temple of a martin-box at the top of an adjoining barn.

Twice more were the pistols tried,
when the seconds interfered; the Colonel declared he was satisfied, and they shook hands, thereby showing that Paul Pliant, by shooting three times in the face of the blessed sun, had proved that he "never supplanted beguiled, and circumvented the aforesaid Colonel Strut, for so it is laid down in the "code of honor."

It seemed now to be all over with Paul. "I must be married then," said he to himself—killing won't save me." The day before the wedding,

Paul met Doctor Bindemight, the worthy parson who was to join him to his bumpy bride.

"Doctor," said Paul, "how shall I escape?"

"Marriage," said the Doctor, in his most solemn argumentative way, "is considered by all authorities ecclesiastical, political, ethical, legal, and judicial, as a bond or covenant, entered into by the mutual consent and agreement of the two parties. Therefore,
I am decidedly of opinion, that when the ceremony is to take place, and I propound the regular question, "Will you take this woman for your wife?"
you reply, "No;" it is not a marriage by no manner of means."

"I can't do it," said Paul mournfully.
"I have tried it a hundred times, but the word stuck in my throat. There is a spell upon me in matters of denying; I must assent to everything. I was born without capacity to do otherwise. Ask me if I have got three heads, I believe I should say "yes!"

"Then you always say yes?"

"Yes, always, certainly."

"Good bye, friend Paul," said the Doctor, civily touching his hat.

"Mercy on me!" exclaimed Paul Pliant.
There was such a turn-out among the bellies the next day! I wish I had been there to see it. Trinity Church was thronged, for every body knew Paul Pli-ant, and the acquaintance of widow Willif comprised nearly the whole of the circle which calls itself "good society."
I wish, moreover, I had the talent of the immortal author of Clarissa Harlowe, at describing feathers; then would I tell you how magnificently the widow was decked out. But this cannot be done.
Every thing was as it should be; in the judgment of the world. The "happy pair" drove to church, a long string of coaches followed them; she blushed and smiled, "and all the world was gay." Was ever a bridegroom in a state of more inexplicable awkwardness? He debated with himself for a moment, whether he should not make a desperate effort, take to his heels and run; but it was too late.

Paul cast a longing, lingering look behind him, as he entered the church door.
"Farewell! blessed light of heaven! I shall be to myself, 'tis the last time I shall see you a free man!" The widow held him fast by the arm.

"My dear Paul," said she, "here we are at last!"

"Yes," replied Paul, with a groan.

"We are already," replied the bridemaids.
Dearly beloved, began Doctor Bindemight. Paul felt his heart terribly.

One minute more, and there will be no remedy," thought he.

He looked most imploringly at the Doctor, as much as to say, "can you be so cruel?" The doctor made an awful pause before the great question. Paul's heart beat faster than ever. "Now for the catastrophe," said he. The doctor gave Paul a keen look, every body was breathless. At length he spoke.

"Do you refuse to have this woman for your wife?"

"Yes!" exclaimed Paul, in the loudest tone he ever was known to utter.

In an instant the idea flashed upon his mind that he was free. He sprang into the bride's aisle with the quickness of lightning, knocked down an old gentleman in apologues, burst through the crowd and bolted into the street.

He ran home without stopping, and it was not till after he had locked himself within his own chamber, that he felt certain that he was not married to widow Willif.

There was a terrible scene at the church, with fainting, &c.; but the widow is alive to this day, and when she finds another man who can't say "no," she may play again the game which had nearly entrapped poor Paul Pliant.

FROM THE MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

JAKE'S EXPERIENCE.

BY PEXLEY PIGSLTAP, ESQ.

There was our friend Jake, that studied law in Puckerville; just the drollest fellow that ever drew the vital air. He was as pleasant and agreeable a being as the world ever saw, and a downright quaker genius. Jake was a general favorite of both old and young, in the village—not an evening gathering, but what he had an invitation, and so pleasant—so agreeable to the ladies, that there was not one in town with whom he was not on general good terms. He was the king of stories—he'd tell a good one, and crack the best joke of the ring, so when we saw him poking round his quill a little out of the way, (for he was a scientific chewer) then he was looking out for a rouse—one that would do the work of shaking the fat sides and clearing the cob webs clean out of the brain. He didn't go way round by Robin Hood's barn, either, and tell what the man's grandfather said and did when he was a boy; but he came right to the "criterion point," and then "was all over—except the laughing, which occupied about half an hour.

Thus did time go on with us at Puckerville, until one Sunday, when we were all at meeting the preacher said there was to be a protracted meeting in the village, and that it would begin the next day, now this took us all by surprise;
for Jake, who generally got the news before it was fairly cold, or any of us, had not heard a word about it. But I went directly home, with a determination to attack Aunt Sarah, (who was a morificer of the church) and learn a little of the matter. I knew I could do it by using a little "soft soap"—tackling her sanity by speaking of her beauty in her youthful days, (you know we are compelled to speak of the beauty of old maids in the past tense) and it happened just as I had planned. Aunt Sarah evaded my question about the meetings;
so I took to myself, I'd hold on a while and then assail her in another quarter.
So, by and by I spoke to her of what I heard my uncle say, that at twenty she was considered by the beaux, the handsomest young lady in the village.

This took like a charm! she swallowed it right down, and immediately her eyes brightened up, while I laughed—in my sleeve! Then I poured another sentence or two into her ears, till she began to look as though she was on the right side of thirty, and then I mentioned something about the protracted meeting.

"Lal yus Pixley!" said she, "you spoke to me about it before, and I meant to have told you then, but somehow or other I forgot it." So she went right on, and gave me the whole riddle, and I found by the meeting folks the matter had been all "cut and dried," as the saying is, and that in the first place all means were to be employed to get Jake;
and him once fast, they were pretty sure of obtaining all the young ladies in the village!

Had not Aunt Sarah told me I must say nothing about it, I should have told Jake and put him on the guard, and so he might have weathered the storm; but as it was, I could only look out for myself, which I did with fear and trembling.
Yes, with trembling; for in those by-gone days, with me, "getting religion," was but another name for getting misery! Then I looked on the gloom spread all over the countenances of the meeting folks and supposed that it was a misfortune, and we cannot always judge the quality of the egg by the looks of the shell.

Monday ten o'clock came, and being invited by Aunt Sarah, I went with her to the meeting house, and entered with a heavy heart, which was rendered no more joyful when I looked at the chief speaker, elder Smashall, from a distance of courses.

Now you may think this a queer name.
Well, be it so—he was a queer man.—
The cognomen of Smashall was not out of place in this instance in the least; for he was of a gigantic frame, but rather thin in flesh. He stood full six feet three in his boots—long swinging arms, with fists at the end of them, that would have answered for beetles—course features, and a mouth—a mouth that would have sent a modern Jonah right off into a fil!

When he stepped up into a pulpit, and opened that mouth, let me tell you, the big thunder stood back, and the old church jurred and echoed again.

The sermon was handed out to us with power, and when out, I thought that there was at least one who would not be found there in future. Tuesday morning the battle had been fairly set in array—old Puckerville was up in arms—old men, young men, and women too, drabbling through the slop, flocking to the meeting house, so there were scarcely enough left at home to do the cooking. In the evening reports began to fly, which proved my fears to be true. Jake had been there all day, and he was awfully troubled.— One had heard him sigh—another had seen tears upon his face, and he left the house that night, with a heavy step; he'd surely be brought out, Wednesday came, and Jake was not in the meeting, but someone had seen him, and he looked dreadfully sorrowful as though he had buried his father—lost his purse—or else "obtained a hope." I couldn't stand it any longer, but determined to make Jake a visit. I went to his boarding house—knocked at his room; but all was silent. I listened at the key hole and thought I heard something, I called his name; but no answer. Alas!
thought I, as I left the house, poor Jake, there'll be no more parties in Puckerville this year; and if this don't "Smash all,"
I shall never hear of Jake Pucker.

What a thought! But never mind,
I had promised they say I better broken than kept—so I concluded I would go in meeting that evening, and see for myself.

The bell informed us of the hour for meeting—it sounded heavy, and with a measured step I went towards the meeting house, and entered it—things looked melancholy—Jake was there—he looked solemn—very—! I felt bad. The sermon came down that night with ten fold power; there was not a dry eye in the house;
among the meeting folks, I mean—it was a stirring effort. After the sermon, the preacher said, that there was an opportunity for "the mourners" to speak. My heart began to thump—Jake rose up—I looked at him—he was sorrowful—I drew a long breath—I looked at him again—a tear stood in his eye—I took out my handkerchief—I did not weep, but then I could not see plain—things appeared dim. Jake moved towards the altar—the house was still as death—it was a solemn moment.

Jake turned around, and with a few sobs and sighs, related the following experience:

"My brethren, when notice was given for this meeting to commence, I laughed at the idea; getting religion in a whirlwind, by steam; and when I first came here, it was with the supposition that it would afford a subject for sneering. But I tell you, my brethren, I have been troubled, awfully troubled; there is power in this meeting; and for one I have felt it; and in hope that it may be of service to some unthinking people, I will relate the manner in which it was done.

It was Tuesday evening, that I was first awakened, when we listened to the powerful sermon of Mr. Smashall. It went to the bottom of my heart, and awoke feelings that I did not know were there. On my way home, I resolved that I would not come here again; for if I did,
I was afraid that I would have to give up my youthful pleasures, and I thought it was better to give away the spirit and enjoy these a little longer. That night I retired at an early hour but I was so much distressed that it was a long time before I could get to sleep, and when I did, I dreamed the most dreadful dream that ever man dreamed.

"I thought that I was taken violently sick; and the doctors said there was no hope of my being better, and I could live but a few hours; and true it was for I kept sinking down, and at last the folks were called in to take the parting farewell. Oh! it was a fearful sight; to see that kind father with sorrow upon his countenance; and the tears of the mother as she bent over her suffering son; and the sighs of those sisters; it even paine me now, for it does not look like a dream it was so like life. The minister, too, was there, to offer his consolation; but it was of no avail; for I had no hope; how shocking the thought—no hope!—Oh! then did I grieve that I had so slighted the protracted meeting.

[Here Jake was interrupted by sighs house. It was a solemn time. Every body was affected. Puckerville had never beheld such a scene before.]

"Death came and relieved me from my earthly trials; but such relief as it was, I wish not soon again to experience. I have no recollection of the dark valley, but I found myself upon a dry and bar-ren waste, urged onward by some invisible though resistless power. As I traveled on solitary and alone, I remarked that the ground grew still more dry; here and there a lonely shrub appeared with withered leaves; but all else was a desert land.
Soon in the hazy distance I thought I could see a cloud of smoke going upward.
Onward I went, and in a moment could see the walls of something; I could not yet tell what. As I advanced, the ground became more parched; I put my hand upon it—it was warm! I began to tremble, and tried to turn back; but horrible to relate, I could not turn round! But forward I passed, and smoke began to issue from the cracks in the ground. It grew hotter, and soon my shoes began to scorch up. The perspiration has pouring from my brow, and in the effort to throw off my coat, my eye caught a view of the wall I had seen before. I could see the gate plain; and over it was placarded in large letters, "The bottomless pit!" Horrors of horrors! and was such to be my endless doom? It was even so, and in a moment I was at the gate, and could hear a dull, heavy rumbling within, and now and then a wild heart-rending shriek!

[Here Jake could hardly speak. His knees smote together. The whole assembly was in fear, I looked at Aunt Sarah;
she looked at me, and with such a look—as much as to say "Pixley, beware!" Jake proceeded:]

"A bell hung there beside that dreadful gate. I seized the hammer—it hissed at the touch of my fingers, and crissed the flesh of my hand. Though it was burning hot, I could not drop it, but immediately smote the bell. The red sparks flew, and how did that bell ring in my ears; but it was only the prelude to sounds more dreadful! The gate opened on its cranking hinges; I stepped in, but the scene before me cannot be described.
Suffice it to say, that there was endless despair in its truth, and its reality is beyond conception of mortals. There I stood knee deep in the burning lava; a lurid glare went up upon the thick dark column of smoke, and the first breath that I drew, made my lungs fairly boil!

I looked away across the undulating wave, and could see here and there a wretched being, with head just above the moulton liquid, uttering heart rending cries, which served but to mangle with the infernal yell of imps and dragons, and render the place more dismal! I had but little time for observation, however, ere the king of that doleful abode made his appearance, with his long tail be lashed his sides; now would he spit

Good Stock vs. Poor. In illustrating the advantages of good stock over poor, the writer of this article says:

"One of my neighbors came here three or four years since, and being a new comer began to look out for some pork for his family. He found a hog of the prairie breed, which he could buy for three cents per pound alive. He bought, penned and fed it on Indian pudding, well made, for three months. The hog weighed, when bought, 150 pounds; he fed it 12 bushels of corn, which was worth then 75 cents per bushel, and when he killed it, the hog weighed, dressed, 161 pounds! When he killed the hog he could buy plenty of pork for 3 cents per pound. — Query: how much money did he make in fattening a prairie hog? Let us balance. Cost of hog, 250 lbs. at 3 cts. $4 50 Corn, 12 bushels, at 75 cents, 9 00

Worth of 161 lbs. pork at 3 cts, 7 83

So he made $5 77 out of pocket. Whoever wishes to keep such animals—let them!

The remaining portion of the Farmer is occupied by an article on the subject of education; proceedings of the Union Agricultural Society; notices of agricultural publications; review of the N. York Agriculturist; price current, &c. &c.

The summary here given of the main contents of the Prairie Farmer, will in some degree show the character of the work. It is expressly designed for the farmers of the West, and they should sustain it. It costs only $1 a year, in advance.

Cranberries. The Farmer recommends the growing this article by farmers. Sir Joseph Banks raised 400 bushels to the acre. The most valuable part of our farms can be made to produce this article, and thus be made the most profitable. The cranberry flourishes well in a wet soil.

FRANCE.

The affairs of Spain occupy the public mind to the exclusion of almost every other topic. The standard of rebellion has at length been decisively raised in Catalonia; it has been long in progress, and has now exploded. How large a share of influence has been exercised by France in promoting this revolt, what secret intrigues have been exercised, to bring it about, and what promises of support and actual assistance have been afforded to the rebels, cannot yet even be guessed at. All that we know is that the news is received with undisguised satisfaction by all parties in France, and that they view the outbreak of civil war in Spain as a kind of triumph gained over England.

There was a difficulty between the government and one of the legislative commissions respecting the proposed reduction of 16,000 troops. The commission recommends this reduction, and notwithstanding the opposition of the government, refuses to reconsider its report. The King is said to be extremely averse to the reduction; if so, he will, no doubt, find a way to avoid it.

SPAIN.

The intelligence from this country is of unusual importance. After many trifling insurrections, and many more rumors of insurrections, the cities of Catalonia have risen against the Regent's authority, and have constituted a supreme junta in Barcelona as its headquarters. In some towns these risings have been accompanied by savage excesses. Accurate details have not yet reached us. The proceedings of the troops and their commanders seem wholly unaccountable, and both citizens and soldiers appear to have abandoned themselves to the effervescence of the moment, and to have changed sides without any settled purpose. The revolt is widely spread, but as yet lies only on the surface; it has attained no root, and were the Regent to enter Catalonia suddenly with some tried battalions, order would be almost instantly restored.

Those of our readers who receive no other information of the march of events in Spain than they gain from our columns will be already aware that a junta had erected itself in Barcelona, but had been compelled by Zurbano, but had been compelled by Zurbano, to evacuate the city and retire to a town at some leagues distance. That he should have permitted them to retire at all when he had a strong force in hand, would have appeared singular, if all the events connected with this rising were not of a kind to baffle all attempts at comprehension, and all efforts to reduce them to any rule with which we are acquainted. This junta always seems to have been active, and as they assume the authority of a civil power, a military commander soon arose in the person of Colonel Prim, who made Reuss his headquarters. Zurbano left Barcelona with his forces to meet him; he found unexpected difficulties, and the Barcelonenses, encouraged by his absence, determined on hoisting the standard of revolt, or as they term it, of independence. Rumors of this spirit spread to Valencia, and on the 11th that town arose, the national militia taking up arms. The captain-general Zavala at the same time assembled his troops, and the two parties remained in presence the whole day. But the dispositions of the soldiers were no longer what they were last year. The insurrection gradually prevailed, and a part of the troops joined the militia. Ferocious excesses were committed by the populace. Chief Gumacho, a decided Esparterist, and several of his agents were also assassinated.

The Barcelonenses were for a time, kept in check by the captain-general Cortez; but corruption was busy among his soldiers. On the 11th disaffection became too manifest for him to close his eyes to the fact. It ran like electricity along a wire through the several regiments; and on the night of the 12th, either unwilling or unable to stem the torrent of revolt, he yielded, and declared unreservedly for the junta. One portion of the city however, and that portion the most important, the fort of Montjuich, remains true to its faith. This fort it was in the last revolution which curbed the town, and ultimately bombarded and conquered it. To obtain this post, became now the great object of the Barcelonenses. The captain-general Cortez summoned the commander to surrender, but he absolutely refused, and declared that he would never break faith with his general Espartero. At the date of the last advice he remained firm as the fort itself, and had made rigorous preparations for resistance in case an attack should be attempted.

While this movement was in progress at Barcelona, Zurbano was engaged in a desperate struggle with Colonel Prim at Reuss. On the 11th he battered the walls, and Prim withdrew, after a short struggle to a neighboring village. Zurbano took possession of the town, but while rejoicing in his victory received an absolute order from Cortez, who had joined the rebels, to withdraw. Perplexed by this new aspect of affairs, he retired on the road towards Arragon, and Catalonia was comparatively cleared of the Regent's adherents. Tarragona then rose, and rumors prevailed of its example having had a wide influence.

Freed from the presence of a foe, the rebel chiefs united their forces and entered Barcelona. Colonel Prim and Captain Milan, together with the rebel junta, entered it on the 16th, and formally made it their headquarters.

Granada also revolted, and General Alvarez was before it with a considerable force. The rebels desired to capitulate, but he would not listen to the terms, and they were throwing up the old Moorish defenses for resistance.

Hitherto it would seem that the movement has triumphed rather from the weakness of the force opposed to it than from its own strength. There seems no vigor or animation in the rebel's councils; they are not even inspired by the ferocious spirit of republicanism. It seems that the whole revolt is more the work of intrigue than the simultaneous and willing rising of a ready people.

At Madrid all was perfectly tranquil. The Regent had announced his fixed intention not to yield, and had addressed a spirited address to the nation. His soldiers were full of ardor, the national guards entirely devoted to him, and the city apparently warm in his cause.

The following paragraphs are from a London paper, in relation to the markets:

"We commence this part with a word relating to the prospects of the harvest. We have travelled since last Friday from London to Coventry, thence by coach through Hinckley to Leicester; Derby to Hull by railroad; by coach or open carriages from Hull through Beverley and Burlington to Scarborough, thence to York by mail coach, and thence to London by railroad. Our brief report of the crops is different from what it has been or would be of the south. Throughout this route north of Derby the acreable produce of wheat cannot possibly be equal to that of last year, and all the crops are backward, most of them of irregular growth, and look starved. There were not, throughout our journey, two hours of sunshine, all put together, and the temperature of the atmosphere was extremely cold.

Of two important facts we have convinced ourselves by observation and enquiry; and as one of them tends to alter our previous impressions, and, in some measure to contradict our intimations, we must state it. Taking the great county of Lincoln, and all that lies north of it to the Tweed, there is not so much old wheat of homegrown in store as there was at the same date in 1842. Neither will the growing crop of wheat throughout the same important section of the country, yield a quantity per acre equal to the yield of 1842. Whether the additional breadth (chiefly at the expense of barley) will afford a full compensation for the deficiency remains to be proved. We had much conversation with a very intelligent Lincolnshire farmer, who holds more than 1000 acres in his own hands, and with his two sons, more than 2000; all, we understand, light tilage land; and this gentleman offered to contract for his whole produce of wheat this year at four bushels per acre less than the produce of last year. He did not himself hold any wheat.

REAL CURIOSITIES.

We insert a pair of curiosities today. The first, which is subjoined, is a letter from Mr. S. Lane Fox, addressed to the editor of The Times. The second is a speech which the honorable gentleman delivered on Monday night, in the House of Commons, in the debate on the Irish Arms Bill, and a report of which will be found in our Parliamentary epitome. Mr. O'Connell, it will be recollected, when Mr. Fox challenged him to debate, replied in a card, in which he recommended the friends of that gentleman to look after him as he was evidently not capable of taking care of himself. The speech and the letter strongly enforce the recommendation. Both would be amusing; did they not indicate a state of monomania on the part of Mr. Fox truly deplorable.

MR. S. L. FOX AND IRELAND.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

Sir.—As you had the courage and good nature to insert my letter to Mr. O'Connell in your paper, I shall be much obliged to you if you will give publicity to this to you, which shall only be a few lines, as I have been much misquoted on subjects which I consider of much importance, and which I should never have mooted unless I had been determined to persevere in my endeavours to prove the truth of what I assert. When I withdrew my notice relative to Roman Catholics sitting in Parliament, I did it in these words:—"That having felt the pulse of the house the previous night on subjects which it would be necessary to introduce in discussing the question. I was sorry to say I had come to the conclusion that nothing but applying the lancet and shedding much blood could cure the delirium under which England and Ireland were now labouring; that I had always been of opinion, that, in consequence of the Roman Catholic Emancipation Act, the two Churches of England and Rome had been brought into a collision, which must end in the final overthrow of one church or the other; it was, therefore, high time for John Bull to wake from his slumbers, lay aside his night cap, and prepare for terrible things, and begged to withdraw the motion."

Now, sir, I have stated my opinion, in my place in Parliament, that we are living in a national breach of God's law in consequence of having ceased to contend for faith handed down to us by our ancestors; for I argued the principle of the Emancipation Act on the Irish Arm Bill, and I contend that it was the properest occasion, for force of arms must first settle the controversy, and I have never hesitated whether to fight for God's law or man's, now that they are at variance. Mr. O'Connell tells the people of Ireland that he is not a fighting man; but I tell you, Sir, for the information of the people of England, that I am a fighting man, and it shall not be long before I am up to my horse's reins in the blood of the infidels. There are some who will say that such language is not warranted in Scripture; but I say that it is warranted in every page of Scripture. I have showed the House of Commons that the elect of Israel, the offspring of those men who first believed the gospel, are planted in this nation, and to them belongs the true interpretation of God's word. There are some lions' whelps in this nation, tried, proved, and justified, and ready at a moment's warning to spring up ready made warriors. They will take their unbelieving brethren by the hand, and plant them in their own land again, and will soon put to silence the rank Popery of the Oxford school. I have hitherto been robed in the garb of folly, and under that disguise have probed the veins of our rulers, and found nothing: I have now done with folly, and am a true witness of what St. Paul says, "that the foolishness of God is wiser than the wisdom of the world."

You will oblige me by inserting this letter in your much-circulated paper; it will comfort many an honest meaning heart. Fools may stumble at it, and let them stumble and be damned. I remain, sir, your obedient servant, S. L. FOX.

'The way of the transgressor is hard.'

—Quite an affecting scene occurred at the Court of Quarter Sessions in Philadelphia, as we learn by the papers of that city, on occasion of the sentence being passed upon one Isaac Miller, convicted of passing counterfeit notes, to seven years confinement in the penitentiary. His wife, who is represented as a lady pretty well advanced in age, was present at Court, sitting on the other side of the room from the prisoner, and manifested extreme agony of mind. Not being able to suppress her heart-rending sobs, she was conveyed out of the building, and it was some time, while she was sitting in the yard, before she was sufficiently composed to return to her home—now made desolate by one act of dishonesty. Miller also seemed to be overcome with emotion.

The Columbia.

The iron work, sails, &c., of this noble steamship, lately cast on the rocks, have all been brought off, and this gallant steamer now lies, a huge disjointed skeleton, on the rocks.

The steamship Margaret cleared at Halifax, on the afternoon of the 8th ult.; under the command of captain Shannon, late of the Columbia. The Margaret probably left the next day.

The Margaret had on board as passengers, when she left for Liverpool, six ladies, forty-nine gentlemen, and eleven in the steerage. She also took seven cabin passengers from Halifax.

When the Columbia left Boston, she had seventy-three passengers for Liverpool. So it will be seen they have all proceeded in the Margaret, with the exception of half a dozen, who remained behind to await the arrival of the Hibernia.

Speed in Travelling.—A party left N. Orleans, on the 30th June, at a quarter past six, and arrived at N. York on the 15th of July, at a little after four, having stopped a day at Niagara. They went by the way of St. Louis, Illinois and the upper lakes, performing a journey of upwards of 3,000 miles in 14 days, without making any extraordinary haste or enduring any particular fatigue.

Is It True?

A gentleman who left the Mormon City of Nauvoo, a few days since, informs the editor of the Cincinnati Chronicle that of the 15,000 persons who make up the population of Nauvoo, about one-third are of various religious denominations. The arrest of their leader, Joe Smith, had caused a great excitement, and he confirms the previous statement that two parties of armed Mormons had left the city for the rescue of Smith, while on his way to Springfield, Illinois. He adds that all the gunpowder at Nauvoo had been made into ball cartridges, and even the women had been actively engaged in casting balls and making cartridges. What next?

Good Friday. The following anecdote says the New York American, is not bad in these days, when reverence for holy usages has nearly left the land:

An Attorney in the Superior Court, on Thursday, was anxious to bring a cause to trial, and went to inquire of the Chief Justice if he would not sit on Friday. "No, sir," said the Chief Justice, "no Judge ever sat on Good Friday, but Pontius Pilate."

A Home Thrust. "Mr. Timothy," said a learned lady, who had been showing off her wit at the expense of a dangle, "you remind me of a barometer, that is filled with nothing in the upper story." "Divine Almira," meekly replied her adorer, "in thanking you for this flattering compliment, let me remind you that you occupy my upper story entirely."

Extraordinary Death!—The Springfield Register, of the 4th inst., says: Last week, a child about 16 months old, son of Mr. Leggett, plasterer, of this place, was drowned in a tub of water, standing near the back door. The mother was in the house at the time, and had not missed the child more than ten or fifteen minutes; when, on searching for it, she saw its little frock floating on the surface, and its head under the water. On removing the body, it was found to be quite dead. The deep grief of the parents may be imagined, but cannot be described. We never heard of a similar event. The child had probably been reaching over the water for something floating on its surface, and lost its balance—unconscious, while grasping at the gaudy bubble, of the treacherous element upon which it floated. Sweet innocent! who does not pity thee?

Robbery.—The jewelry store of C. W. Chatterton, of this place, was broken open and robbed of about twenty-six watches, and a quantity of jewelry, on the night of the 29th ult. The unfortunate proprietors, who are unable to sustain the loss, have offered fifty dollars reward. Several thousand dollars of cancelled city scrip was also taken. A day or two afterwards, three suspicious fellows were detected passing counterfeit money near Rochester, one of whom were arrested. Keep a look out for the villains!

STRAYED FROM THE TEMPLE.

ABOUT two months ago a dark brown Cow, white face, carries her head high, long horned, bright eyes, a white spot on one hind foot, white on the end of the tail, white legs, rather short teeth, nine years old last spring, she was expected to calve in a few days when she went away; she is not a very large Cow but pretty stout built.

ALSO, a black Cow, white face, white feet, lower part of tail white, had a dirty red and white band on her horns across her forehead, she was very poor when she went away, gave a little milk, had no calf, rather a small sized Cow, and about seven years old as near as can be remembered.

Whoever will give information of either or both of the Cows to the Temple Committee or the Temple Recorder, or will bring them to the Temple will do us a favor, and if they desire it a reasonable compensation shall be allowed for trouble and expenses.

The descriptions are as near as can be remembered, but only having them here a little while it may possibly not be exactly correct.

From the Midnight Cry.

LETTER FROM WILLIAM MILLER.

Dear Bro. Himes—This is the first time I have wrought for six weeks or more. The time past for sixteen weeks seems to me like a dream, and a painful one too. I do not complain, God is good, and although he afflicts us by pain, disease and prostration of both physical and mental powers, yet he has the power to efface all these things to operate as means to help us on to glory. Blessed be his name, I find my present affliction has been not entirely lost, I hope it has and will prove a blessing.

Before I was taken sick last winter, at times I was very much unreconciled to my lot, as I would call it, often thinking God had laid on me more than I was able to bear. I often murmured and complained, and often prayed that I might be permitted to retire from the turmoil and bustle of the world at least for a few weeks. God granted my request, and I have been confined to my room four months but how different from what I expected. I anticipated rest, but experienced pain; I expected to enjoy the society of my family and friends, and have been much of my time a burden to myself and them. Yet during the whole time of my sickness, my faith in the glorious appearing of Jesus Christ this year, has been stronger than ever. I experienced for such a length of time before. It seemed to me so plain, so clear, that I doubt would be as wicked as to doubt the existence of a Supreme Being. And, although my pain in body was very severe, yet it was made quite tolerable by the strength I obtained through my faith in the blessed book of God's word, and the promises therein of the glorious inheritance of the saints. It appeared to me at times, that the whole plan of salvation lay before me like a landscape, and I was enraptured with the sight. I have a number of times during my sickness, felt as did Paul, to depart and be with Christ, &c., but God has seen fit to continue me here as yet. My health is on the gain, and I think in a few days I shall be able to labor again in the vineyard, if a door should open. Perhaps none may want me now, no matter, I will leave that to my heavenly father and the people. The opposition in this quarter are gaining in confidence and violence, since the 23d of April is past. But they begin to rejoice too quick. We have not yet passed 1843. I want to hear from you. Not one word since brother Fleming wrote; do write. God will try our faith more than ever, depend on it, and although trials deep and sore may assail us, let us not waver, for the Lord will come, and will not tarry.

Yours as ever,

W. M. MILLER.

TERRIFIC ENCOUNTER WITH A

Speaking of a formidable pirate said to have been lately seen in the West Indies, the Richmond Star takes occasion to give the following particulars of an encounter with freebooters several years ago in the same latitude, which have never before appeared in print, but which are nevertheless true. The general facts of the case are these:

Captain Robinson, now a wealthy and much respected citizen of New York, while in command of a ship many years ago, at a time when several of the European powers were at war, discovered, one day, just as night was setting in, a suspicious looking sail under his lee; but as the stranger made no movement towards him, he concluded that she was probably one of the many privateers which then swarmed the ocean. The next morning he discovered the strange sail nearer to him, and very soon became satisfied that she was not only hostile, but a pirate. He had one gun, and an abundance of small arms and ammunition on board, and fortunately a good number of passengers, mostly men. When satisfied that he had no alternative but to fight or surrender, he assembled the passengers in the cabin, and told them that they must decide whether they would surrender, and be themselves murdered, and give their wives and daughters to the brutality of the fiends then pursuing them, or stand upon their defence like men. If they chose the latter alternative, he gave them a fair warning that it must be a desperate conflict, and that boarding the pirate was probably their only chance of success.

Most of the passengers responded promptly that they would fight to the last, if fight they must. Although to the windward it was found that the superior sailing of the pirate was more than a match in a long chase for their advantage, and Robinson resolved at once to meet the crisis, and decide the matter while his position gave him the choice of commencing the engagement. He steered at once to meet the foe, thus giving him to understand that he was prepared for him. As he neared him, the pirate gave him a broadside from the guns, three in number that crippled him badly, killing two of his best seamen and one passenger. Still he kept on, raving another broadside that injured him more but not so badly as the first. In a few minutes he was near the pirate, and by a skillful manoeuvre got a raking position, and taking good aim, he for the first time discharged his gun, loaded heavily with canister and grape. The effect was tremendous, the vessel being much cut up, and the slaughter among the private crew prodigious. This created confusion among them, and enabled Robinson to plant his bow against the pirate, just where he preferred.

In an instant the bowsprit was crowded with the devil, looking like very fiends, who dashed on the forward deck in large force. A bloody struggle then ensued hand to hand, in which the ship's defenders were driven back by the overwhelming force, and the prospect for an instant was that they would be annihilated, beyond the chance of hope. At this moment, some of the passengers shouted in English to their friends to "clear the way stand back for the gun." The spaniards raised a yell of triumph, as they saw their foes, who had met them so sturdily, rush back, and were in the act of springing forward as the murderous charge of the gun met them with sweeping carnage—leaving but few alive and covering the deck with the mangled remains of more than a score of the wretches. But a fire force, supplied their place and several times the good gun cleared the deck of the blood thirsty villains. As they went leaping back the fourth time, Robinson shouted to his men to "board!" and in a moment the strife was on the pirate's own deck.

The force of the pirate had been terribly cut down in the previous contest, and after a short but desperate struggle, in which Capt. Robinson received a shocking wound from a cutlass, passing from his forehead, between his eyes, across the neck yet he killed the man who wounded him and two others after receiving the slash; the pirates were all driven below and there secured. The cabin was then cleared of every valuable, the vessel scuttled, and in a short time the vessel sunk, carrying with her every soul left on board, with the wounded, dying, and dead. Capt. Robinson was wounded in many places besides the last shocking wound across his face, the scar of which he yet bears, and many of his force had fallen or desperately wounded; but he carried his ship safe through her voyage, and was able to tell of one of the most gallant and desperate actions of which we ever heard or which history can show.

AN ATTEMPT TO ASSASSINATE THE POST MASTER GENERAL.

By late arrivals from Washington, D. C., we are informed that an attempt to assassinate C. A. Wickliffe, Post Master General, was made by John Gardner, son of Colonel Gardner, late a clerk in one of the departments at Washington. The occurrence took place on board the steamboat Georgia, on her trip from Norfolk to Baltimore. Mr. Wickliffe, with his wife and children, were advancing towards the dining saloon, when Gardner encountered the party, and before his purpose could be conjectured, suddenly raised a knife with which he had been cleaning his nails, and with great violence stabbed Mr. W. in the chest. Gardner was instantly seized by Lieutenant Bradford, and prevented from repeating the blow; his person was then properly secured and kept in guarded custody until the boat arrived in Baltimore. The point of the knife struck the upper part of the sternum or breast bone, without penetrating it. Mr. Wickliffe expressed his conviction that Gardner was deranged; spoke feelingly of the young man's relatives, to whom he referred as intimate friends, and despatched a person to prevent, if possible, the commitment of Gardner to jail.

WOMEN.—It seems as if nature connected our intelligence with their dignity as we connect our happiness with their virtues. This therefore is a law of eternal justice—man cannot degrade woman without himself falling into degradation; he cannot raise them without becoming better. Let us cast our eyes over the globe, and observe the two great divisions of the human race, the East and the West. One half of the ancient world remains without progress, without thought and under the load of a barbarous civilization—women there are slaves. The other half advances towards freedom and light—the women there are lovely and honored.

We learn from the report of the Pennsylvania Hospital for the insane, for 1843, that insanity prevails to a much greater extent amongst the unmarried portion of the community, than with those who have companions to assist them in supporting the adversities of life. Of the present inmates, 170 are single, 95 married, 34 widows or widowers.

Hibernian Humour.—I remember an anecdote which Governor Clinton and General Morton used to tell with great glee. On some occasion they took a boat at Whitehall to cross over to one of the islands in the Bay. It so happened that the boatman was from the Emerald Isle.

Dear away, my lad, said General Morton, we're in a hurry.

Yes, General! replied Pat, pulling away lustily at the oar.

You call me General. How do you know who I am? asked Morton.

Know you? exclaimed Pat. What a blockhead your honor must take me to be, not to know the great General Morton, the prides of the battary, and the great little dog of war.

But ha! ha! cried out the governor; there you're caught, general. But pray my friend do you know who I am?

Why, to be sure I do, says Pat: the renowned governor Clinton, the Irishman's real friend. Now know ye! Don't I pray for ye both every night? and wasn't the last boy we had christened by the name of De Witt Clinton General Morton O'Neil? and isn't it happy his mother would be this night if she had a pair of shoes and stockings to put on the craters?

Double fair, and a good supply of shoes and stockings, sent the humble namesake of the great O'Neil to his home a happy fellow.

Wreck of the Alert.—The new barque Alert, which sailed from Halifax, N. S., on the 10th inst., with the left wing of her Majesty's 64th regiment, bound for England, was cast away on Goose Island about eighty miles eastward of Halifax, on the following morning. Although the lives of all were saved, every article belonging to them except what they stood in, all lost, and the passengers among them 95 women and children, were left in a most destitute condition. The odd five being infants born since the Alert sailed from Halifax. The Rose ship of war had been despatched from Halifax to the assistance of the passengers, crew, &c.

For China.—A beautiful new brig, built at Boston for the China market, and armed and equipped in all respects as a man of war, with a battery of eight or ten guns, arrived here on Saturday morning, and sailed again yesterday, on her return, via New York. She is called the Antelope, commanded by Capt. Forbes, and we learn that the object of her present trip is to get her in trim and try her powers of sailing. Passengers, Col. T. H. Perkins, J. P. Cushing, Esq., and J. M. Forbes. —Norfolk Herald 24th ult.

MURDER, MUTINY, AND PIRACY!

We learn from the New Bedford Bulletin of last evening, says the Boston Times of the 1st instant, the following facts:—

On Sunday, about 9 o'clock, the sloop Fairhaven of Providence, from New Bedford for New York, when 6 miles S. E. of Cuttyhunk, fell in with a schooner running before the wind, all sails set, but no person visible on board. On boarding her found one anchor out with a short scope, and a hole cut in the cabin floor with an axe.

She proved to be the schooner Lavinia from Alexandria. She was scuttled forward and had three feet of water in her hold.

In a small book found in the cabin the following entry is made:—

Friday Night, 14th July, 1843.

About half past 10 o'clock it was the mate's watch on deck along with me, when the captain came on deck and told me to keep the vessel to the wind, and I did so—then the mate was aft on the seat close to the taffrail asleep, and the captain went up and shook him, and said you are a damned fellow to be officer of a vessel, and struck at him, and they at one another. The mate got the captain down on his back on the taffrail, and main sheet block under them—it gave a jerk and pitched them overboard. So I put my helm down, but it was of no use for by the time the vessel was round they were not to be seen. There was no one on deck but myself, and could do no good for them. I ran forward and called the men, but by the time they got up the vessel was going afore the wind and we could not hear or see them.

The boat of the vessel, which from the tackle used in hoisting tackle was evidently a long boat, was gone. The gangway rail was taken away to make room for the boat in leaving her own deck.

The fore-cabin of the scamen were gone from the fore-cabin. The captain's trunk was stove open, and completely ransacked of everything of the slightest value. His letters were all left. We have no time to speculate upon this mysterious affair, but it is the prevailing opinion that a piracy has been committed, and the captain and mate thrown overboard. There is foul play somewhere, and time will develop the mystery. The Fairhaven arrived here last evening with the schooner in tow. She is now in the possession of Mr. Gordon the United States Marshall.

[It is suggested that the above vessel is the schooner Sarah Lavinia, capt. Darr-born, cleared at Alexandria 1st ultimo for the West Indies.]

From the New York Observer.

HON. JOHN Q. ADAMS ON VOLTAIRE.

HARTFORD, July 10, 1843.

Messrs. Editors:—Below I send you a letter from Hon. J. Q. Adams, which I trust you will be disposed to make public. A word, by way of explanation.

About two years since, while I was travelling in Vermont, the pastor of a small village put into my hands a volume of Voltaire's Philosophical Dictionary, purporting to have been translated by John Quincy Adams, with a commentary preface by the same. An infidel neighbor, boasting that J. Q. Adams was an infidel as well as himself, Mr. H. procured the address of Mr. A., delivered at New York, in which he strongly urges the study of the Bible. After reading it, the infidel replied, "If J. Q. Adams blows hot and cold in this way, I will have no further confidence in him." I suspected at the time that this was either a forgery, or else the name of another J. Q. Adams; yet knowing that it has been attributed to the Ex-President, and therefore that his influence was made to sanction infidelity, I finally determined to ascertain the facts in the case, and also his views in regard to Voltaire's writings. These are contained in the following letter.

Yours, &c., JOSEPH EMERSON.

Quincy, 17th June, 1843.

Rev'd Sir:—In answer to the inquiries in your letter of the 14th inst. I cheerfully state—1st, That I never published or made a translation of Voltaire's Philosophical Dictionary; 2d, That I never read that work; and am therefore unable to give an opinion upon its merits; 3d, That I never saw the book mentioned by you, as purporting to be a translation of Voltaire's Philosophical Dictionary, by John Quincy Adams; 4th, That I have heard of a person, a stranger to me, bearing that name, but know not how he came by it, nor to what family he belongs.

I have read extracts from Voltaire's Philosophical Dictionary, and others of his writings infected with infidelity, but I have also read and seen performed on the stage his tragedies of Zaire, Alzire, and Mahomet, and have read his epic poem of the Henriade. I have read of his writings, in which he complains that he had been accused of irreligious propensities, and appeals to these tragedies and this epic poem as proofs of his orthodoxy. He boasts that when his tragedy of Zaire was first performed, it was called the Christian tragedy. In the tragedy of Alzire, a Spanish viceroy is murdered by a Peruvian Indian, and when the assassin is brought before him, as he is dying, he says—

"Learn how the difference between thy gods and mine."

Thy gods command thee to revenge and murder; And mine, when thou hast stabbed me to the heart,

Command me to pity and forgive thee!"

In his Henriade, he glorifies Henry the Fourth for having been converted by a vision in which his ancestor, St. Louis, proves to him the truth of the doctrine of transubstantiation; and he dedicated his tragedy of Mahomet to pope Benedict the XIVth, assuring him that in exposing the impostor of a false religion, there was no person to whom the work could with so much propriety be dedicated as to the head of the true religion: a compliment for which the sovereign pontiff rewarded him, as a true and faithful son of holy church, with his paternal and apostolical benediction.

Now if the infidel neighbor of the Rev. Mr. Hubbard declared that he would have no further confidence in me, if I had been blowing hot and cold, by publishing a translation of Voltaire's Philosophical Dictionary, and yet professing for myself religious sentiments and opinions, how could he have any confidence in Voltaire himself—such an adept in the art of blowing hot and cold, that he wrote with the same pen his Philosophical Dictionary and his Henriade, his Zaire, his Alzire, and his Mahomet—how could the infidel justify himself for recommending to his friend the work of such a weathercock in religious opinions as Voltaire, and yet profess to withdraw all his confidence in me for my supposed inconsistency in publishing the infidel trash of Voltaire, and yet avowing religious sentiments for myself?

The truth is, that Voltaire was a lively, sarcastic, disingenuous, prejudiced, fanatical disbeliever in Christianity, ready to assume the mask of religion, or to cast it away, just as it suited his interest or his humor; intent above all things upon making himself a name, and flustering himself that his easiest way to do it was by demolishing the Christian religion. I never thought his Philosophical Dictionary worth reading, and I read his Bible only to despise it.

I have read also his Maid of Orleans, and despised him also for that—infamous for its perversion of all moral principle, and all decency. Its injustice to one of the brightest characters in human history is its most crying sin. A Frenchman who can think or speak of Joan of Arc without reverence, must have a heart colder than the everlasting ice of the poles.

You are at liberty, sir, to make such use of this letter as you think proper. I am certainly not ambitious of the reputation of spending my time in translating or in publishing Voltaire's Philosophical Dictionary.

There are very few from some of whose writings I have recoiled with more disgust and horror; of his infidelity and dissolute morals I have had more than a surfeit; and if I have ever derived any benefit from them, it has only been by that process which extracts healing medicine from the deadliest of poisons.

I am, very respectfully

And thankfully, dear sir,

Your obedient servant,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Newly Invented Carriage Spring.—In this age of novelty and experiment, we have rarely had occasion to notice a more agreeable and decided improvement than that of an application of a new style of spring capable of adoption to all classes of vehicles by John S. Tough, a gentleman of this city whose ingenuity has been successfully directed to various branches of scientific mechanism. We enjoyed a short excursion the other day in a carriage suspended upon the principle to which we refer, and of course we were enabled to testify experimentally on its qualifications, and to do so the more readily, being prepared to acquit ourselves in terms of unqualified approval. The suspension of the carriage is upon a plate sustained by spiral springs enclosed in a brass cylinder, each set occupying a vertical position between the wheel and the body of the carriage. The springs are so arranged, that the weight of one or two persons acts only upon the upper or lighter spring, while a heavier weight brings the lower spring into action, thus regulating the buoyant motion of the vehicle. A spiral spring acting horizontally upon the perch, restores constantly the equilibrium, and the admirable effect of the whole arrangement was indisputably tested upon a portion of a thorough road, in traversing which the rudest effect would scarcely be deemed, even by a lady, an inconvenience. A description we are aware is calculated to convey an idea of complicated machinery, but to those familiar with the use of the spiral spring, a glance would satisfy them of its simplicity. We are inclined to think that the invention of Mr. Tough is destined to a very general use, especially as the cost is no more than that of the ordinary springs in use; while the advantage is inestimable to those whose business calls them frequently to the carriage. It strikes us that the application of the system to railroad cars, would effectually relieve them of that continuous jar, to which the passenger entertains a decided objection. —Baltimore Sun.

THE NEIGHBOR.

WEDNESDAY, AUG. 16, 1843.

THE NEW YORK HERALD AND THE MORMONS.

In justice to the editor of the above paper, we have to state that he has not taken a very straightforward unprejudiced course in regard to Mormonism, the opinions of "—" to the contrary notwithstanding. In the Herald of July 29, there is a long letter giving a plain unvarnished statement of the arrest, trial, acquittal and honorable course taken by Joseph Smith in the late difficulty, written by a "Gentile," which reflects great credit upon the writer, and disinterestedness and fairness on the part of the editor as a public journalist. There is also an ordinance published in the same paper, which for the information of our friends we publish with his remarks.

Strangers in Nauvoo.—The Mormons on the Look-out. The Mormons of that city have just passed some rather remarkable laws respecting strangers. Joe is evidently on the look-out, and is determined to purify the holy city. Strangers visiting Nauvoo will please remember, then, that the city council, marshal, constables, and city watch, are authorized and required to require all strangers in Nauvoo to give their names, former residence, for what intent they have entered or are tarrying in the city, and answer such other questions as the officer shall deem proper or necessary; and for a failure or refusal on the part of strangers to give the desired information, or for giving false names or information, they shall be subjected to the penalty of the ordinance concerning vagrants and disorderly persons, passed November 13th, 1841. And the aforesaid authorities are further required to hail, and take a person found strolling about the city at night, after nine o'clock, and before sunrise, and to confine them in ward for trial, unless they give a good and satisfactory account of themselves, or offer a reasonable excuse for being thus caught out after nine o'clock. The aforesaid authorities are also required to enter all hotels, or houses of public entertainment, and such other habitations as they may judge proper, and require the inmates to give immediate information of all persons residing in said hotel or habitation, and their business, occupation or movements; and for a failure, non-compliance, or false information, their license shall be a forfeit, if it be a public house, and they, and the transient persons subject to the penalties as before mentioned. And it is further ordained, that if any of the aforesaid officers shall refuse, or neglect to do their duty as required by this ordinance, they shall be fined one hundred dollars, and be broke of office.

These enactments redound greatly, we think, to the good sense of the Prophet. The adoption and enforcement of similar regulations in our own city of sparkling fountains and filthy streets, would do the state some service. They might help us to get rid of the blacklegs that strut along Broadway and insult our ladies; and the poor creatures who crawl about the grog-shops during the week, and publish ale house puffs on Sundays, for a living.

Notwithstanding the spouting and fault-finding of some of our world be wise men, the above shows clearly what the opinion of those that are most competent to judge is, of the wisdom of Joseph Smith and of our municipal regulations.

We receive a great many papers from all parts, and have a good opportunity to judge of the respectability and usefulness of the papers in the United States in general, and have no hesitancy in saying that the Weekly Herald stands among the foremost in the Union; with one or two alterations we should pronounce it the best, as it is; we recommend it to the citizens of Nauvoo and vicinity.

A report has just reached our ears, that some few of the citizens of Carthage, feeling a little chagrined that the election had not gone according to their wishes, entered the Court and expressed a determination to resist by violence, if they could not by argument, some of the candidates from taking office, who had been duly elected, and legally qualified thereto. We hope, for the credit of the county, for the honor of the State of Illinois, and for the good name of the citizens of Carthage and vicinity, that no such circumstance has taken place, and that they have not so disgraced themselves; but from the source that we received it, we are led to believe that it is true. We shall give particulars next week.

The Puseyite controversy is every day assuming a more formidable aspect both in this country and in England. There is every prospect at the present time of their being a great row in the Episcopal church.

More Rioting in Canada.—An Orange celebration took place at Kingston (Canada) on the 12th, in honor of the battle of the Boyne, which resulted in a serious riot between the Irish Orangemen and Ribbonmen. One young man by the name of Morrison, was shot dead, and two others were seriously injured. The police were out, and a strong detachment of the 23d British regiment were brought to the scene of action; a number of arrests were made and order at length restored.

Several rows between the same parties also took place at Hamilton, (Canada west.) but they did not produce any serious mischief.

On the Beauharnois Canal about two thousand five hundred men are now quietly at work, (leaving nearly one thousand in idleness,) but arrests of the ringleaders in the late outrages continued to be made.

Murder in St. Marys County.—We learn from the Leonardstown (Md) Herald that on the night of the 13th inst. an intemperate wretch, named John Williams, residing in the neighborhood of Charlotte Hill, deliberately murdered his wife, after which he removed her lifeless body into the yard fronting the house, and then fled. He has not yet been arrested. The Herald says, his little son, an interesting boy of eight years old, and who saw his mother expire under the blows inflicted by her inhuman husband, seated himself close by the remains of his murdered parent, and he continued to watch over during the whole of that gloomy night, and did not leave the spot until the neighbors had assembled the following morning.

Rescued from Drowning by a Dog.—Francis A. Ball, of New London, Conn., fell into the Thames the other day, and being unable to swim, would have been drowned but for his dog, a large Newfoundland, who jumped in after his master, seized him by the collar, held his head and face above the water, and brought him to shore in safety! The grateful master immediately bargained for a splendid collar for the noble animal, upon which is to be engraven the particulars of the heroic act.

Soda for Washing.—We have been requested by a correspondent, to publish the following recipe for washing with carbonate of soda.

To five gallons of water, add a pint and a half of soft soap, and two ounces soda. Put the clothes (after soaking over night) into the mixture at boiling heat, rubbing the parts most soiled with soap. Boil them one hour—drain—rub and rinse them in warm water, they are fit for drying. Half the soap and more than half the labor is saved by washing in this manner.

Making Soap.—A lady correspondent of the Tennessee Agriculturist in a discourse to farmers' daughters, has the following remarks on soap making. The fair authoress, in our opinion, would make a valuable contributor to the ladies' monthly magazines. Though the practical, matter-of-fact, common sense character of her articles might not be deemed to come within the legitimate range of belles lettres, they would have the merit of being useful—and that is more than can be said of two-thirds the stuff that makes up the pages of most of our popular monthlies. A young lady—other a farmer's daughter or a merchant's daughter—who intends to become a housewife, would profit infinitely more from a single essay upon the soft soap of domestic economy, than from whole tomes of the "soft soap" of nonsensical love-letters and "sentimental nonsense." But hear the lady. "Among other things, let me tell you to learn how to make soap. I do not know that I should have thought of naming this, if my ignorance on the old woman who lived with me, to make it. I went to her when the soap-keg was almost empty, and told her we must have some made as quick as possible. 'Why, for! Miss, now don't you see it ain't the right time of the moon?' I tried to persuade her that soap making and the moon were very slightly connected, if the other part of the business was well conducted. It was, however, to no purpose. I had to wait till the 'right time' came round before I could get my soap. After this, when I had the superintendence of a large family, I was obliged to buy it by the barrel, because I did not well understand the manufacture of the article, and I was really ashamed that such extra expense was caused by my ignorance. Sometimes there was too much time with the ashes; then again not enough; sometimes it was too greasy, and sometimes any thing but what it ought to be. I tell you my experience in the matter, so that you may learn from your mothers now, and not have the trouble of learning, when you ought to be making it. As I have given you so long a talk on the subject, I will add a recipe I found a short time since in the Cultivator, vol. 5, page 124. It may be of use to some of your mothers if not to you. Mr. Tomlinson writing to Judge Buel, says: 'My wife has no trouble about soap. The grease is put into a cask, and strong lye added. During the year as the fat increases, more lye is stirred in, and all occasionally stirred with a stick that is kept in it. By the time the cask is full the soap is made ready for use. It is made hard by boiling and adding a quart of salt to three gallons of soap. It is put into a tub to cool, and the froth scraped off. It is afterwards melted to a boiling heat, and a little rosin or turpentine given which improves the quality.'

Some of you will think me a most unsentimental sort of a woman, then I advise you to learn how good bread, butter, coffee, pickles, puddings &c., are made; but you will have to learn sometime or do worse. Work with your own hands, even if it should tarnish their whiteness a little. A man does not consider the beauty of a soft white hand a very strong recommendation, when he finds it has been kept for show and not for use. I think a young lady should be able to scour a kettle and grace a diamond.

LUCY.

The Spirit of Liberty.—Soon after the close of the long French war in Europe, a boy was standing on one of the bridges that cross the Thames at London, with a number of small birds in a cage for sale. A sailor, who was passing, observed the little prisoners fluttering about the cage, peeping through the wires and manifesting their eager desire to regain their liberty. He stood for some time looking at the birds, apparently lost in thought. At length addressing the boy he said:—
'How much do you ask for your birds?'
'Sixpence apiece, sir,' was the reply.
'I don't ask how much apiece,' said the sailor, 'but how much for the lot; I want to buy the whole.'

The boy began his calculation, and finally offered them for six shillings and sixpence.

'There's your money,' said the sailor, and opening the cage door, he let all the birds fly away.

The boy, looking quite astonished, exclaimed, 'What did you do that for, sir? You have lost all your birds.'

'I tell you, boy, that shut up three years in a French prison as a prisoner of war—I know how precious liberty is—and I am resolved never to see any thing deprived of it that I can make free.'

'The money, then?'—The most remarkable miniature man that has ever appeared, exceeding even the famous Sir Geoffrey Hudson, who was put into a dish of pastry under the crust, and then introduced upon the table at a great banquet in Cromwell's time—is now on a visit to this city, and will be happy to see company at Knickerbocker Hall. He is remarkable for his symmetry is spirited and social, and weighs only 15 pounds—a miniature man.—Albany Ad.

What I have seen.—A writer under this head gives several good hits. He says he has seen farmers go offener to the store than to the mill;—he has seen a farmer's wife spend twenty bushels of wheat to buy a silk dress when there was an execution out against her husband;—he has seen a mother call her child a brat in the cradle and the child a few years after call the mother a harder name;—he has seen farmers and their families drink strong water and have the ague six months, when four days labor would dig a good well;—he has seen farmers daughters which were accomplished in every thing except carding, spinning, weaving, knitting, making cheese, cooking and other things which would render them useful;—he has seen so he says, many more things equally strange, which we have not room to copy.

Large spots on wooden clothes may be completely removed by strong vinegar. The vinegar effectually neutralizes the lime, but does not generally affect the color of the cloth. Dark cloth, the color of which has been completely destroyed in spots six inches square, has thus had its original color completely restored.

The whiteness of ivory handle knives may be restored by rubbing them with fine sand paper or emery.

The oftener carpets are shaken, the longer they last, as the particles of sand which collect upon them grind the thread. Sweeping them also wears them.

Dry wood will produce on a moderate estimate, twice as much heat as the same amount of green wood; and saves much trouble in kindling fires on cold mornings.

Melancholy Accident. A serious and fatal occurrence took place at the Asylum for the Blind, in Columbus, Ohio, on Friday evening, the 7th inst. A blind pupil, named George Brown, aged fifteen, whose parents reside in Knox County, had with two or three others, gone to the roof of the asylum, and attempted to walk across it, but mistaking his course, he walked to the edge of the roof and was precipitated to the pavement below. He fell on his head and face, breathed for ten minutes, and expired without a groan or struggle. No blame can attach to any one; as the children had gone to the roof without the knowledge of the superintendent.

A Horrible mode of Death.—The Toronto (Canada) Constitutionalist says that a young man named Bailey, a prisoner in the penitentiary, in consequence of insubordination, was placed for punishment in a cistern, where it was necessary that he should work in order to prevent the water overflowing him, and that during the process he was overpowered by the water and drowned.

A Man Hung in Mistake.—A correspondent of the Macon (Geo.) Messenger says that some time since, a gentleman from Alabama, who put up at the Union Hall, in Forsyth, said that a negro was lately arrested for an outrage, when he confessed that he some time since nearly killed and then hung a white female near Milledgeville. He said he choked her first, and finding she was near gone, he concluded to hang her, in which situation she was discovered. The negro also stated that a Mr. Johnson was executed for the murder, and that he was an innocent man; that he himself had committed the murder, and that no person was concerned with him.

Steamboat Accident and Loss of Life.—Yesterday morning, says the Pittsburgh Age, of the 31st, the steamboat WARREN that runs between this city and Beaver, when opposite Shousstown, burst her blow off pipe, and one of the passengers jumped overboard, and there being no saw attached to the boat, he was drowned. Shame on the officers of a steamboat that will sacrifice human life for five dollars.

CONGRESSIONAL ELECTION.

We give the following from the State Register, the latest news received.

FIRST DISTRICT.

In Madison, Morrison, whig, leads Smith, dem. 221 votes. Last year 530 for Duncan.

THIRD DISTRICT.

But little news from this district, but sufficient to show that Ficklin the democratic candidate is elected.

Wentworth has a majority in the fourth district of 410.

From the fifth district we learn that Douglas, dem has a majority in Peoria of 100; in Macoupin, 190; in Schuyler, 25; in Green he has the usual democratic majority.

From the sixth district, we learn that Mr. Hoge [the democratic candidate for congress] received 1000 majority at the Nauvoo precinct, Hancock county. This result is ascribed by some of the whigs here, to the visit of Judge Brown to that place in behalf of his son-in-law, Mr. Logan. Whether these whigs are right in their conjectures we shall not undertake to determine. We rather think the bitter persecutions of the Mormons last summer by Gov. Duncan [for whom Walker voted] and the Sangamo Journal, and its pet Bennett, have had as much influence in producing the result as the eloquence of Judge Brown.

AN ORDINANCE to remunerate Horace S Eldridge, for land occupied by a street.

Be it ordained by the City Council of the City of Nauvoo, that the Mayor be, and he is hereby authorized to make unto Horace S Eldridge a good and sufficient deed for the land lying on the river side of Lot No. 4 in Block No. 151, so occupied as a Street in the original survey of the Town Plot of the City of Nauvoo, on condition that Horace S Eldridge make a good and sufficient deed to the City of Nauvoo, for the land which the street now occupies.

Passed August 12th, 1843.

'Perfect Bull'—Pope, in his translation of Homer, in speaking of an eagles and her young, says:

'Eight callow infants filled the massy nest, Herself the ninth.'

Also, in his Essay on Criticism:

When first young Maro, in his boundless mind, A work to outlast immortal Rome designed.'

Dryden says:

'A horrid silence first invades the ear.'

Thompson also sings:

'He saw her charming, but he saw not half The charms her downcast modesty conceal'd.'

Virgil also knew how to make a bull:

'Mormur et in media arma ruamus.'

'Let us die and rush in the middle of the fight.'

But the prize bull belongs to Milton, who, in his Paradise Lost, sings:

'Adam, the goodliest man of men since born His sons, the fairest of her daughters, Eve!'

THE MODERN CRUSOE OF THE INDIAN OCEAN.

Any one casting his eye over the eastern hemisphere of our planet will find about the 37th degree of southern latitude and 77th eastern longitude, two small specks in the waste of waters, between the Cape of Good Hope and New Holland. These islands are known to mariners by the name of St. Paul's and Amsterdam; and, on a late occasion, two East Indian men passing them sent off a boat's crew and landed on the eastern side of St. Paul's, for the purpose of ascertaining the correctness of their time, and examining the geological structure of the islands. After pursuing their course for a considerable distance inland in that desolate region, a very strange looking object was presented to their view. At a short distance they observed a man, a stranger to their party, who at first seemed disposed to avoid them. He wore a roughly made seal skin cap, and jacket of same materials, while his lower extremities were covered by a ragged pair of canvas trousers. His face was deeply bronzed by exposure, and his beard hung down upon his chest. Upon asking him whether he belonged to the party from the other vessel, he answered in the negative, and expressed joy at falling in with countrymen. His name he said was George Stewart, and came originally from Scotland, but had emigrated to America, where he had settled, but had been unsuccessful. He then embarked in an American whaler, which ship had left him and another man on the island, as nearly as he could calculate, a year before. English and American whalers sometimes leave men upon the islands for the purpose of catching seals for the ship, pursuing their voyage to the whaling ground, calling at the island and picking up the men on their return. It sometimes happens that the ships are lost, and humanity shudders at the fate of the hapless individuals who are thus left to their solitary fate. They dwell upon this chance, and urged him to take a passage, in their vessel, but he instantly declined. His companion, with whom he had quarrelled, had left him for the neighboring island, and since that he had been tolerably happy. It may appear strange that two men, in such circumstances (which ought to have bound them together,) should have quarrelled, but it seems his companion was avaricious and overbearing, so much so that Stewart said he seldom closed his eyes in safety at night for fear of being murdered, knowing that all the profits of their mutual labors would belong to the survivor. He had been enabled to exist tolerably well, as the lagoon supplied an abundance of fish, and he occasionally killed a hog, though he was indifferently supplied with vegetables. His hut was in a recess formed, by nature in a rock, the entrance being filled up nearly with stones, and contained his chest with a hammock, gun, and some other articles. As night approached the crew returned to their vessels, and Stewart accompanied them in his boat, upon receiving a promise not to take him to sea. On board, he was an object of considerable curiosity, and on being again urged to leave his dreary abode, he stoutly declined, having a firm reliance on the word of the captain of his ship, who, he felt confident, would call for him on his return. The breeze freshening, it was found necessary to put to sea, and, after supplying Stewart with some deficiencies, he left them, all eyes being fixed on his receding figure in the boat, till the distance shut him out from their view.—[Illuminated Magazine.]

OFFICIAL VOTE OF McDONOUGH COUNTY.

Mr. Editor:—You will much oblige many friends in McDouough county by publishing the following official returns of the election in that county, as taken from the returns of the Clerk of the County Commissioners Court to the Secretary of State.

Democratic. For Congress.

Joseph P. Hogue, 537. Cyrus Walker, 498. County Commissioner's Clerk.

J. M. Campbell, 622. John Fletcher, 511. County Recorder.

Wm. T. Head, 569. Wm. Y. Head, 470. County Commissioner.

Wm. Ferguson, 547. John Clarke, 400. County Surveyor.

Samuel A. Hunt, 389. H. J. C. Avril, 444. County Treasurer.

J. M. Chapman, 439. I. S. Tingman, 555. Probate Justice.

James Clarke, 494. Wm. W. Bailey, 492. A HORRIBLE MURDER.

The Washington (Geo.) News publishes the following extract of a letter, and vouchers for the respectability of the writer. The letter is dated

COLUMBUS, (Geo.) July 12, 1843.

I believe I have room to give you the particulars of one of the most shocking murders I have ever heard of, committed in Barber county, Alabama, a few days ago. A Mrs. Guchet, [pronounced Gasha] and her two daughters were visited on the day of the murder by a Mr. Brown and his wife. They took dinner, and remained until late in the evening with the old lady and her daughters. When they were about leaving, they insisted that the old lady should go home with them and spend the night. She refused; giving, as a reason, that her daughters would be left alone; and farther, that all the money she had was in the house. They continued urging her, until she consented to accompany them, to remain the night.

Shortly after her departure, a sick and weary traveller rode up and begged permission to stay the night. The two ladies said they were alone, and he could not stop. He said he doubted whether he could ride to the next house; and presuming they were afraid of him, he told them if they would consent to let him remain, he would take his room and suffer them to keep the key. To this proposition they consented, and the traveller soon went to his room. Some time during the night he was awake by a noise in the other room, there being but two in the house. Continuing to hear some one moving about, he got up, went softly to the door, and discovered a man at a bureau examining the drawers. He hailed the individual, who instantly drew a knife and made at the traveller, who, as he ap-preached, shot him dead at his feet. The pistol alarmed the negroes, and when they came up they went into the ladies' room, and found both of them lying in their beds with their throats cut, and dead. The traveller, on enquiring for their mistress, was taken to Brown's house. On meeting the old lady, he told her some one had murdered her daughters, and that he had shot the villain. Mrs. Brown exclaimed, 'you have killed my husband,' and so it turned out. The very person who had spent the day with Mrs. Guchet had murdered her daughters! What a providential thing that the man should have been permitted to remain, to punish the assassin!

AGRICULTURAL.

From the Sangamo Journal.

Household Affairs.—Items in Domestic Economy.—Spirits of turpentine will dissolve grease spots on woollen clothes, and soap suds applied after wards will remove it. Strong vinegar will remove lime spots from woollen clothes. The whiteness of ivory handle knives may be restored by rubbing them with fine sand paper or emery. The oftener carpets are shaken, the longer they will last. Dry wood, by experiment, is found to give twice as much heat as wet wood.

Making felled cloths.—The chain should be twisted as evenly as possible, and all made of one kind of wool. The filling should be twisted even also, but not so hard as the chain. Pulled wool should never be mixed with shorn in making cloth. The flannel should be laid wide, at least a yard; the wider the better. If you desire to put pulled wool into the same piece of cloth, fill it in at one end, so that it can be cut off. The cloth should not be dyed before it is filled; it will not make as good work. A. AVARICE.—One of the most common and absurd marks of ambition that ever shows itself in human nature, is that which comes upon a man with experience and old age, the season when it might be expected he should be wisest.—It is the passion for getting and saving money. It may be remarked for the comfort of honest poverty, that this desire reigns most in those who have but few good qualities to recommend them; humanity, good nature, and the advantages of a liberal education are incompatible with avarice. It is strange to see how this abject passion kills all the noble sentiments and generous ambitions that adorn human nature. It renders the man who is overrun with it a selfish and inconsiderate master, an unobscure husband, a severe parent, and a worthless neighbor.—[London Dispatch.]

STRAYED FROM THE TEMPLE.
ABOUT two months ago a dark brown Cow, white face, carries her head high, lop horned, bright eye, a white spot on one hind foot, white on the end of the tail, white bag, rather short tailed, nine years old last spring, she was expected to calve in a few days when she went away; she is not a very large Cow but pretty stout built.

ALSO, a black Cow, white face, white feet, lower part of tail white, had a dirty red and white band on her horns across her forehead, she was very poor when she went away, gave a little milk, had no calf, rather a small sized Cow, and about seven years old as near as can be remembered.

Whoever will give information of either or both of the Cows to the Temple Committee or the Temple Recorder, or will bring them to the Temple will do us a favor, and if they desire it a reasonable compensation shall be allowed for trouble and expenses.

The descriptions are as near as can be remembered, but only having them here a little while it may possibly not be exactly correct.

The Grave.

BY MONTGOMERY.

There is a calm for those who weep,
A rest for weary pilgrims found;
They softly lie and sweetly sleep
Low in the ground.

The storm that wrecks the wintry sky
No more disturbs their deep repose;
Then summer evening's latest sigh
That shuts the rose.

I long to lay this painful head
And aching heart beneath the soil,
To slumber in that dreamless bed
From all my toil.

For misery stole me at my birth,
And cast me helpless on the wild;
I perished, oh, my mother Earth,
Take home thy child.

On thy dear lap these limbs reclined,
Shall gently moulder into thee;
Nor leave one wretched trace behind Resembling me.

Hark! a strange sound affrights mine ear,
My pulse, my brain runs wild—I rave;
Ah! who art thou whose voice I hear?
"I am the grave!"

The grave, that never spake before,
Hath found at length a tongue to chide;
Oh, listen! I will speak no more:
Beside, pride!

Art thou a wretch of gloom forelorn,
The victim of consuming care?
Is thy distracted conscience torn
By fell despair?

Do foul misdeeds of former times
Wring with remorse thy guilty breast?
And ghosts of unrequited crimes
Murder thy rest?

Lashed by the furies of the mind, [see]
From wrath and vengeance wouldst thou
Ah! think not, hope not, fool to find
A friend in me.

By all the terrors of the tomb,
Beyond the power of tongue to tell;
By the dread accents of my womb;
By death and hell!

I charge thee live! repent and pray,
In dust thou shalt find no repose;
There yet is mercy; go thy way,
And sin no more.

Art thou a mourner? Hast thou known
The joy of innocent delights,
Endearing days forever flown,
And tranquil nights?

Oh live! and do thy cheerful part;
The sweet remembrance of the past;
Rely on heaven's unchanging will
For peace at last.

Art thou a wanderer? Hast thou seen Overwhelming tempests crown thy bark?
A shipwrecked sufferer, hast thou been Misfortune's mark?

Though long of winds and waves the sport,
Condemned in wretchedness to roam,
Live! thou shalt reach a sheltering port,
A quiet home.

To friendship didst thou trust thy fame,
And with thy friend a deadly foe;
Who stole into thy breast to aim
A surer blow!

Live! and repine not o'er his loss,
A loss unworthy to be told;
Thou hast mistaken sordid dross
For friendship's gold.

Seek the true treasure, seldom found,
Of power the furthest griefs to calm,
And soothe the bosom's deepest wound
With heavenly balm.

Did woman's charms thy youth beguile,
And did the fair one's smiles prove?
Hark! she betrays thee with a smile,
And sold thy love!

Live! 'Twas a false bewildering fire:
Too often love's illusions dart
Thrills the fond soul with wild desire,
But kill the heart.

Thou yet shalt know how sweet, how dear,
To gaze on listening beauty's eye;
To seek—and pause in hope and fear,
Till she reply.

A nobler flame shall warm thy breast,
A brighter, madder faithful prove;
Thy youth thus age shall ever be blessed
In woman's love.

What earthly lot, where'er thou be,
Confess thy folly, kiss thy rod,
And in thy changing arrows see
The hand of God.

A bruised reed will not be broken:
Afflictions at his children's feet;
He wounds them for his mercy's sake,
He wounds to heal.

Humbled beneath his mighty hand,
Prostrate his providence adore;
'Tis done! Arise! He bids thee stand,
To fall no more.

Now, traveller in the vale of tears,
To realms of everlasting light,
Through time's dark wilderness of years,
Pursue thy flight.

There is a calm for those who weep,
A rest for weary pilgrims found;
And while the mouldering ashes sleep
Low in the ground.

The soul of origin divine,
God's glorious image freed from clay,
In heaven's eternal sphere shall shine
A star of day.

The sun is but a spark of fire,
A transient meteor in the sky;
The soul, immortal as its sire,
Shall never die.

Foreign.

From the N. Y. Herald

Fifteen days later from Europe.

By the Acadia, Capt. Ryrie, which arrived at 4 o'clock (August 3d), information at Boston, we have London dates to the 18th and Liverpool to the 19th ult. She was twelve days making the passage to Halifax and fourteen to Boston. The weather was thick and unpleasant during the passage, especially from Halifax.

The news of chief interest relates to business, in which there was a decided improvement. The cotton market has been firmer throughout the month and an advance had been realized. This will be good news for the south. For American provisions the market was good. Ashes had declined, and the prospect for holders is unpromising.

Ireland continues to occupy the attention of Parliament and the Ministry, with no prospect of a satisfactory result. The Cabinet is divided in Council, and proposes no decided measures. The last debate closed with a ministerial majority, on a division of only 73—the smallest they have yet had. Meantime O'Connell is proceeding triumphantly in Ireland.

Dr. Hahnemann, the founder of Homoeopathy, died in Paris on Sunday week, aged 83.

O'Connell held what is termed an extraordinary meeting of the Repeal association, at the Corn Exchange, Dublin, on Saturday, for the purpose of favoring his adherents with his views of the debate on Ireland. He made a long speech on the present state of parties, the position of the Ministry, and the prospects of repeal.

SPAIN.—The intelligence from Spain leaves no doubt that the fate of the Regent is sealed. Madrid is in a state of siege. He proposes to keep open his communication, it is stated, with Saragossa and Cadiz—if he can. The advance guard of Zurbarán had entered Saragossa, where there general was expected the following day with ten battalions. Madrid was peaceable, but as for the Regent, he is what the French papers call him—a lost man.

Poor Espartero, enfeebled by disease and hunted on every side like a wild boar, seems likely to sink. A brave man struggling with the storms of fate is certain to command the sympathy of the distressed; but there is unhappily but little disinterested patriotism in Spain.

TURKEY.—The Augsburg Gazette of the 4th instant states that the Serbian revolution has been stopped by the re-election on the 17th ult., of Prince Alexander Kara Georgevitch. The election was legalized, as far as the Porte is concerned, by the presence of Hafiz Pachá, and, as far as Russia had a right to appear, by the presence of Diaven and the Consul Wutchenko.

THE SANDWICH ISLANDS. Despatches have been sent off by government to Capt. Lord G. Paulet, of the Gariesfort frigate, in the South Pacific, acknowledging the free independence of King Tamehama III, and the Sandwich Islands from this or any other country.

The celebrated Field Marshal Count Wittgenstein, died at St. Petersburg on the 16th ultimo, at the advanced age of 87. A letter from Tabriz brings the disastrous account of an earthquake having nearly destroyed the whole of the town of Khor, between the lake of Urmia and Persia, by which upwards of a thousand people perished. The inhabitants of Tabriz had also been alarmed by frequent and violent shocks.

The Messrs. Barings, of London, has undertaken the construction of the Canal across the Isthmus of Darien. It is to be completed in five years. Wiener's Times says, the weather which for one week past has been extremely favorable, promises an abundant, and what is better, an early harvest. The grain crops look extremely well, and the accounts from all parts of the country are very uniform. Even Ireland, where, a few weeks back, the bad weather had done damage, seems likely, under a strong sun and genial warmth, to recover its lost ground.

And yet, strange as it may appear notwithstanding the present favorable appearances, the corn market is rising rapidly. During the last fortnight an advance of not less than 9s. per quarter has taken place in the price of wheat. The Wakefield, the Liverpool, and the other principal corn markets, are remarkably buoyant and active and considerable speculation is going on. The excitement is attributed to two causes—first, a belief that the quantity of corn in the country will not suffice until the new crop is ready; and secondly, that the new crop will be late.

We publish the following from the Sangamo Journal, for the purpose of letting our wing friends be heard in their own defence, and of giving all parties an impartial hearing.—Ed.

MR. ADAMS ADDRESS.

Mr. Adams, a Mormon Missionary, and a man of decided talent, recently delivered two addresses to our citizens from the door of the State House. The first was devoted to religious doctrines, and the second to Mormon persecutions. The last Register gives what it states to be a sketch of this last address, and puts language in the mouth of Mr. Adams which he never used. Mr. Adams did not mention the Sangamo Journal in his speech—he never asserted that the last arrest of SMITH was the work of the whigs. The remarks published in the Register as coming from him on this subject, he never used. The report of his address, therefore, as published in the Register, is false, basely false, and known to be so by the hundreds of citizens who heard it.

The Register makes Mr. Adams say that he approved of the conduct of the Governor in ordering the arrest of SMITH. The Nauvoo paper takes an entire different view in this matter. It says that a discretion lies with the Governor—that the Governor of Missouri refused to give up some individuals in that State, who had committed outrages on the Illinois side of the Mississippi river; and that the Governor of this State had discretionary power in relation to the Missouri requisition. All the movements in this affair, from the issuing of the writ, down to the false representations of the speech of Mr. Adams in the Register, show that it was got up by loco focos to effect the coming election. Our opponents can rarely suffer an election to be decided on the ground of principles. They prefer to rely upon some trick—some scheme—for success.

ARREST OF SMITH.

The recent proceedings in reference to Joe Smith have been called a whig plot—the result of the deliberations of the Whig Junta—for the purpose of securing the success of the whigs at the coming election. It is strange the Register would hazard its well established reputation for concocting ingenious falsehoods, by an insinuation of so flimsy a character. In what a ridiculous position does he place his political friends! The executive of Missouri, who is presumed from his station at least, to be a man of sagacity and discernment, is the dupe of a secret Junta in Illinois, composed of his political opponents! The executive of our own State, concerning whom the same presumption would lie (however much we might be disposed to question its accuracy) is also created by the same manœuvre, and forced to comply with their secret designs! A grand jury, hundreds of miles distant, is also made to figure, and the whole machinery of the law, backed by sheriff, agents, and governors, is brought into the most beautiful operation by the agency of a few individuals! A most flattering compliment to the penetration of its own friends and the abilities of loco foco politicians, to be gulled, and cheated, and bamboozled, with their eyes wide open, by the machinations of a secret Junta composed of unknown political enemies.

But the statement contains too glaring a lie upon its face. The proposition is too absurd for even a loco foco to believe. The true version is most probably this: Illinois has heretofore been considered a strong loco foco State, and is rapidly increasing in political importance in consequence of its increase in representation in Congress. The Legislature of last winter made a prodigious effort by bargain, and intrigue and gerrymandering, to establish its future reputation in its new aspect; and to secure, if possible, an entire loco foco representation in Congress. But since that period it has been discovered that although they could furnish a Dictator, who could rule the legislature, they could not supply seven men of ability to manage the Congressional Districts—that though they might carve out Kangaroo, Hobgoblin and Nondescripts of all descriptions, they could not manufacture politicians to order with the same ease. On the other hand, they perceived, that the whig Conventions presented men before the community, who by their well established character for integrity, for talents and political knowledge, were likely to secure the esteem and confidence of the people. The loco foco office holders became alarmed, when they saw the tremendous energies of Hurdin, opposed to the purile efforts of an effeminate striping the giant mind of Walker, contrasted with the abilities of Hoge; the manly, convincing, polished eloquence of Browning, dissipating the errors, and subverting the sophistry of an expiring demagogue. They doubted the success of their device, when they witnessed Hurdin, with unsullied integrity, assail the ever doubting, wavering, hesitating, shifting, political weathercock—fickle Ricklin; when they saw the gentlemanly demeanor and distinguished abilities of Morrison, contrasted with Bob Smith; and the honesty and candor of Spring, compared with the black malignity and hellish calumny of the unprincipled Wentworth. Good cause had they to fear, and there were determined by all the arts their ingenuity could devise, to prevent the effects that truth, and talent, and principle were calculated to produce upon a free thinking and honest people. The Mormons have hundreds of votes—the loco focos hold the iron rod of power; and when the former, in the exercise of their inestimable privileges of freemen, showed signs of defection from political error, and a determination no longer to countenance political misrule, what more ingenious plan could be devised by the latter, than to hold the powerful head of their church as a security for the political faith of his followers?—Why was a similar farce enacted just prior to a previous election, and why, at this critical period are proceedings now arrested, unless it be to keep the requisition suspended over him as a bugbear, to frighten that numerous body into a base subservience to the self-styled democratic faith?—Here is the clue to the whole proceedings. When the office holders (and who more interested than themselves) perceive the numerical inefficiency of their own candidates; the confidence reposed in their opponents; the general progress of an enlightened political knowledge throughout the State, and the defection of a great mass of voters from their standard, what less could be expected, than that the power, which was granted them to be exercised for beneficial purposes, should be perverted for the accomplishment of their corrupt and nefarious designs?

But we leave the subject. We trust, however, that the class of individuals, for whom this machinery of the law has thus been put in operation, will remain undaunted by the menaces of power—that they will assert the privileges and maintain the rights of independent freemen—that however they may cast their votes, they will prove conclusively, that neither threats, nor bribery, nor artifice, shall make them swerve from the execution of their duty, or abandon the rulers of their own free choice.

The Register says that the Journal after denouncing Gov. Ford for issuing one writ for the arrest of Joe Smith, now assails him with equal bitterness for declining to issue another, and to call out the militia bodies, as desired by the agency of Missouri. Will the editors of the Register inform us when we assailed Gov. Ford for "declining" to issue another writ for Smith, or for not calling out the militia of the State? It is perhaps as near the correct statement of our remarks upon the subject as is usual with the Register, since it fell into that unfortunate habit of making "typographical errors." We charged Gov. Ford with holding the matter in "suspense," under the pretence of wishing time to "consider," when his real object was to terrify Smith—to hold the rod over him and force him to vote the democratic ticket. Dares the editors of the Register deny that this was not the object of the Governor? Speak out and tell the truth. We said then, and now repeat, that this course of the Governor with regard to Smith—holding him in suspense in order to influence his vote—was a cruel and tyrannical exercise of power.

A NEW NEGRO NATION.—From an extract published in the Albany Argus, and derived from the narrative of Mr. Wilson, a Missionary in Africa, we learn that he has discovered a nation of Ethiopians never before seen or described by any white man. Mr. Wilson is stationed on the Gaboon river, which empties into the Atlantic about twenty miles north of the equator.

The mission is at the mouth of the river, but, having a fine opportunity, Mr. Wilson accompanied Toka, a distinguished negro merchant, up the Gaboon and its tributary, the Big Oromolo, to Koubang's town, fifty miles from the ocean, on Bukwe, branch of the Big Oromolo. This was as far up the river as he ascended. While there he met with a new nation of Africans, some of whom were said to come five days' journey from the interior; that is, from two or four hundred miles from the sea coast. He calls them the Pangwe people, because they came from the direction in which a country of this name lies. The distance from the coast indicates that they came from Ethiopia, and possibly that people may spread over that vast unknown region of Africa.

The existence and use of iron of their own manufactures seems very remarkable and philosophers would say, indicate an advanced state of civilization; for it is known that a barbarian or savage people never have iron of their own manufacture until it has been first introduced by the whites. The non-existence of slavery and the slave trade among them shows a feature still more distinctive from the ordinary African.

We are furnished by the Argus with the following passage from the Journal of Mr. Wilson:

"During our short sojourn in this place we met with a number entirely different in their features and general appearance from those in this part of the country, some of whom were said to have come five, and others ten or twelve days' journey from the interior. They were known by the name of the Pangwe people. They were on a visit to this part of the country, which is as near to the sea coast as they have ventured. Hearing of us at this place, they came in considerable number to see a white man and old Toka, one of whom was as much an object of curiosity as the other. Those of them whom we saw, both men and women, were vastly superior in their personal appearance to the maritime tribes; and if they may be regarded as a fair specimen of their people, I should have no hesitation in pronouncing them the finest Africans whom I have ever met with. They were no clothing, except a piece of cloth made of the inner bark of a tree. This is fastened around the loins by a cord. Nor do they cover their heads. On the other hand, they wear the bushmen in this region by telling them that they wear cloth to conceal their personal defects and their external diseases. Both men and women braid their hair with a great deal of taste. The women braid the hair on the forehead of the head in two rows, which lies over the forehead not unlike the tress of a cap. That on the back part is plaited into five or six braids which reach below the shoulders."

The men are of medium stature, remarkably well formed; health in their appearance, and manly in their deportment. They had knives, spears, traveling bags, and other articles of curious and ingenious workmanship; specimens of which were procured for a small quantity of beads. All of their implements are made of iron of their own, which is considered vastly superior to any brought to the country by trading vessels. They set no value upon cloth, and as yet have never acquired a taste for tobacco or rum. Beads, powder, and brass they prize very highly, and were willing to give away any thing they had for the smallest quantity of either of these. They represent their country as mountainous and healthy, affirm that contagious and other diseases common to the maritime regions are unknown among them. They have never participated in the slave trade, and regard it, as is by no means unnatural in their circumstances, with the utmost abhorrence. One or two instances are known where they have visited attempts to enslave their people with signal vengeance. It is difficult to define the limits and extent of their country. Perhaps the most westerly border of what is known as the Pangwe territory was within one hundred and fifty miles of the coast, and from thence it may extend many hundred miles into the interior, and possibly spread itself over a large portion of the south side of the Mountains of the Moon. Their country is represented as immensely populous; but I could not learn that they had any very large or powerful organizations. They are aware that vessels visit the opposite coast, and they affirm that they have seen articles of merchandise brought from that quarter. I am inclined to think that the Pangwe people are migrating in large bodies toward the coast. If so, the intermediate bushmen, weakened as they are by the slave trade, must inevitably be supplanted."

Frightful Railroad Collision.—Another of those terrific accidents occurred yesterday on the Philadelphia and Pottsville Railroad, which can always be avoided by a simple attention to the duty of a Railroad agent. Never start a car when a train from an opposite direction is due; let no persuasion induce you to depart from this rule. Yesterday morning about three o'clock, this collision took place about two miles above Reading, between a train of empty ascending cars and a train of descending burden cars loaded with coal. The up train started, hoping to reach Mohr's before the down train; but when opposite Mr. Heister's, at the leap cut, the two trains came in contact, breaking every thing to splinters! Two men were instantly killed and several others frightfully wounded. It appeared that the hands on the loaded cars jumped off before the contact and escaped uninjured—but those on the empty cars were the sufferers. Mr. George Hackman was instantly killed, and his mangled remains were covered entirely with the frightful wreckage, as were those of Daniel Fornwalt. The father of the latter, Gottfried Fornwalt, had a leg broken, and was otherwise injured so horribly that his recovery will be a miracle. Samuel Shultz, a several of his ribs broken, and Conrad Feger was also seriously injured.

The evident cause of this casualty was the carelessness of the agent who allowed the upper train to start before the arrival of the burden cars. We say to the company let him be dismissed immediately. The damage in a pecuniary point of view is said to be very great.—Phil. Forum.

scolla from a crane. Officers and crew all well.

The Vincennes left Campeachy on the first inst. where all was quiet. The Mexican forces, naval and military had returned to Vera Cruz leaving the Texian squadron, under Commodore Moore, at anchor off Campeachy, who subsequently sailed for Sisal on the 28th ult. for the purpose of receiving funds and refitting his vessels. The reports that have been in circulation of his having lost nearly all his men by sickness and desertion were found to be untrue; his vessels and crew were in a very good condition when they sailed from Campeachy.—New Orleans Pic 18th ult.

Rail Road Accident.—The train going west, which met with so serious an accident near Schenectady on Friday last, encountered further mishaps before it reached Buffalo. In passing the village of Seneca Falls, the train came in contact with a wagon driven by three little boys. The wagon, with its occupants, was caught upon the "cow catcher" and carried some twenty or thirty rods. The wagon was broken into fragments, and the horses were killed, but the boys fortunately escaped with few bruises. The boys had been waiting to see the train go by, and, on its approach the horses became unmanageable and ran upon the track just as the locomotive came along.—Alb. Eve Journal.

A Battle with Bears.—We find in a French paper the following narrative, taken from the Koenig (Russia) Gazette: The colony of Westmania Labe, Siberia, has been the scene of a sad occurrence. Three colonists, Sabanoff, Blachowski and Dymtreff, in hunting in the great forest of Uba, captured two little bears which they took home with them; three days had passed, and these savage pets had begun to recognize their masters; when during the following night a terrific howling was heard in the village; the Siberian colonies, which are devoted to exile, are always surrounded with a palisade. The colonists, however, whose curiosity got the better of their alarm, left their huts; but what was their terror at seeing the dwelling houses of Blachowski and Dymtreff surrounded by a band of bears, standing on their hind legs and howling with rage. The colonists ran to arms; one of them sounding the alarm bell. The Cossacks of the garrison mounted and formed in the place d'armes. All the colonists, armed with muskets and axes, marched against the enemy. The combat began with musket shots, the bears in return tore up the hedges and did not fear to attack the men. The contest was terrible and was not finished until one of the cabins was set on fire. This conflagration drove the enemy away. Eight bears remained on the field, five men lost their lives, and thirty were wounded, some very severely.

Miller now says "get ready and wait all the coming of the end of the world."

Seduction and attempted Suicide.—On Thursday night between ten and eleven o'clock a shore boat rowed by one man and containing a young female, came along side U. S. ship Independence, and on being hailed the female desired to know if midshipman — was on board. On being answered in the affirmative she insisted on seeing him, but the officer of the deck told her that was impossible, as not only the regulation of the ship but the rules of the service forbade it. She urged, implored and intreated, but the officer, actuated by a stern sense of duty, was still compelled to adhere to his resolution of refusing her admittance on board.

Finding that he was inexorable, the young girl, without a moment's hesitation, sprang from the boat and sunk. A seaman who had been standing in the fore chains, listening to the girl's conversation, saw her make the spring, and as she touched the water he sprang overboard after her, and a few lusty strokes brought him to the spot as she arose. He seized her, and holding her up, the shore boat dropped along side of them and took in the unfortunate girl and her gallant preserver.

The officer of the deck had her brought on board, and surmising that something extraordinary must have occurred to induce the female to attempt suicide, he summoned the first lieutenant. When he reached the deck he drew from her a history of the causes which brought her out at that hour of the night in such a place, and it was one of love, confidence, ruin, and subsequent desertion.

The midshipman who was the cause of the poor girl's troubles, was called on deck, and being confronted with her, was at once recognized. What steps the first lieutenant next took with the recreant officer we are ignorant of as yet, but the girl was sent on shore, having first given her address, with the assurance that full and ample justice should be done as soon as the commodore should arrive.—N. For the Nauvoo Neighbor.

NAUVOO.

Not like the infant's growth, prolonged and slow,
To manhood's vigor, has been thine, Nauvoo!
But, as the reed, by Pagan authors nam'd,
That sprang spontaneous from their parent earth,
In all the towering strength of manhood's prime,
Thy career, so passing strange, began.
Where we might look for childhood's nerveless arm,
And all its nameless incidental wants,
We find the hand of industry employ'd,
And busy wheels unceasingly impell'd:
Nor is there wanting, should the red man come,
To war-dress clad, to plunder and destroy;
Or foreign foe, our nation to assail;
Of worse than they, more savage and untam'd,
The hot-temper'd, deaf to reason's voice,
With passion's fire illumining his eye,
And fiendish malice rankling in his heart;
With honor all'd to mercy's gentle call;
And "warriors" graven on his dark'nd brow,
The trampling steed, the "plumed troop,"
The phalanx dense, and all the dread array
Of warriors ready for the hostile charge!
Not Athens, Rome, or Thebes, famed in song,
And boasting all on origin divine,
Can point to aught in history's living page
That bears so strong an impress of the God!
Home of the Saluta! manna'd of thy God
Thou couldst not thus have risen from the earth
And, Phoenix-like, imbib'd new life,
E'en from the ashes of thy funeral pile. P.

HOME MANUFACTURES.

Start not, dear reader, we are not going to inflict upon you a party-political essay, we shall not undertake to prove that foreign manufactures should be allowed to come into our markets duty free, and compete with our own workmen—nor the reverse; I wish to tell about things nearer home. The inhabitants of Chicago and all northern Illinois, who lived here 6 years ago, know that almost all our manufactures were imported; wagons and farming utensils, shoes and hats, cabinet ware, &c.; and they also know that they had to pay not only the original cost where the articles were manufactured, but transportation, in urance, commission and storage, which made them cost high, especially all bulky articles. Shops are now established, and business is being done here, and coming to supply us with most of our manufactures. Our chair and cabinet makers, wagon and harness makers, have nearly driven importers out of the market; tailors and shoemakers are multiplying; tanners are building and building; and oil is extensively manufactured in town; linseed mills are built in the country, and one is erecting in town; tobaccoists and umbrella-makers, deer skin dressers and gloves, are establishing themselves, and many other trades which it is needless to mention; still there are many trades which ought to be here that are not yet represented. New England should send us her manufacturers of axes, shovels, scythes, and mechanics' tools; Pittsburgh her rolling mills and forge hammers; woolen and other manufacturers also would surely be successful; and various other trades would flourish.

We shall not undertake to prove that it is desirable these should come, but shall "take it for granted." We believe all desire it; and the question is, how shall we induce them to establish here. We must make it for their interest, and show them that it is so; and this we can do. Only make a point of buying home manufactured articles, whenever you can, instead of imported; you need not pay an extra price, only give the home-made article the preference when the cost and quality are the same. Give preference to home-made shoes, hats, machinery, oil, newspapers—and especially the Prairie Farmer—and home manufactures will flourish. And the nearer home the better; if the article is a foreign manufacture, your money goes out of the country to pay for it, and if you pay it to your neighbor, some portion of it will be likely to return.

There is much said, and something doing, towards the raising and manufacturing of sugar, it is important; we have the material, and it will be accomplished. The raising and manufacture of silk also must in time be a great business in this country; the wonder is that more has not already been done; its advancement, though slow, is sure. The manufacture of this fabric, which is used in the United States, employs many thousands of hands, and where could it be better raised and manufactured than here, where the operatives can be so cheaply supported?

The same reason will apply to the manufacture of woollen goods; the provisions for the support of the operatives will cost but about one half as much as in the eastern States, and one fourth what they cost in England; and besides this, the growing of wool here is no longer an experiment; the prairies, it is now known, are well calculated for raising sheep. And we have this advantage; we have abundance of the best of lands at 10s. per acre, against the poorer lands of the eastern States at $10 per acre; or the soil can be bought for about the yearly rent of eastern lands.

With these facts presenting themselves clearly, as they must, to the mind of every man that examines them, we can not doubt that we shall soon not only grow our own wool, but manufacture it, and pay with interest for all the cloth we have imported.

Let us repeat, to mechanics, farmers and every well wisher to his country's prosperity—buy of your neighbors; at least, give the preference to the home made article.

THE RIGHT OF VISIT.

Sir—I have just arrived in this country in command of the English brig Ranger, from a trading voyage on the west coast of Africa. While prosecuting my trade in palm-oil, at Grand Cestos, having on board, as is customary in that trade, a number of Kroomen engaged in loading and working the vessel, I was boarded by the officers of a French man of war, and my vessel placed under arrest for the reasons mentioned in the following translation of an endorsement made on my register by the captain on releasing me:—

(TRANSLATION.)

March 13, 5 o'clock P. M.
"I have visited the English brig Ranger. The captain of that vessel not being able to justify the presence on board his vessel of 20 blacks (Kroomen) I have given orders to seize her. Nevertheless, although I am well convinced that, in the vigorous exercise of my powers, I have a right to seize this vessel, I decide to waive that right after having detained her all night in order to make the captain feel the inconvenience of embarking blacks without being duly authorized by the agents of his government, either at his port of departure or in the colonies."

(Signed) H. BAUDIN,
"Captain commanding the Nisus corvette and the station of the West coast of Africa."

"Grand Cestos, March 14, 1843."
Four days afterward I was so fortunate as to fall in with her Majesty's brig Pantaloon, and on representing the case to her commander, Lieutenant Lapidge, he gave me the following certificate:—

"Her Majesty's brig Pantaloon, off Trade Town, Western coast of Africa, March 18, 1843."

"This is to certify that the owners of the British vessel Ranger, of which Geo. Thomsen is at present master, are authorized to have twenty Kroomen on board for the convenience of loading the vessel and other purposes."

(Signed) C. H. LAPIDGE,
"Lieutenant and commander."

I find that the public are already aware of the recent seizure of the Saint Christopher, near the same place, and under similar circumstances, but with consequences more fatal than in my case; she having been carried to Sierra Leone, for condemnation, and although released, her voyage was ruined.

But what I want to know is, where this system of retaliation is to end. I am not prepared to say that we have a right to complain of the French in thus repaying us for the outrages which they allege we have committed on them. The "exploits" of captain Hill in the case of the "Senegambian," and some others, continue to rankle in their minds, and it will be well if this feeling on their part do not give rise to some collision more serious than any which have yet occurred. But this is a subject for the consideration of the two Governments; my only business is to call attention to the state of uncertainty and embarrassment in which British trade on the coast of Africa is placed by such a state of things.

I submit that it is calculated to ruin our trade entirely, for it is quite impossible to obtain at all times the permission which the French captain alleges to be necessary for the employment of laborers on board ship on the coast of Africa. An English trading vessel arriving on the coast might have to wander about for weeks in search of some British commander authorized to give him such permission, while an American vessel or some competitor, might carry off the trade and ruin his voyage. Another vessel, the Englishman of Bristol, was seized at the same time, and treated in the same manner. When I was seized and carried off sea, the Kroomen I was employing were in the act of coming alongside with a large canoe and three puncheons of oil.

Since my arrival I am told there are other measures in contemplation for embarrassing and restricting the British trade on the coast of Africa, with a view of putting down the slave trade. I think such measures can only be brought forward by persons totally ignorant of the tendency and practical effect of British commerce in Africa, because they ought to know that unrestricted legitimate trade has already done more to put down the slave trade than all the costly experiments which have so ostentatiously been made for that purpose, by parties who have taken upon themselves to lead the Government and the public in matters they do not understand. No better plan could be put upon to promote the slave trade than to throw difficulties in the way of lawful commerce. The hazard of conducting trade in such a country as Africa, is naturally great enough without adding to the risk attending it by foolish and vexatious legislation.

The French captain told me that he was well aware of the innocent and necessary employment of the Kroomen on board his vessel, but that he wished to give the English a lesson on these subjects in order that they might learn the inconvenience of being treated themselves as they so often treated others.

How far such a petty system of warfare is becoming between two great nations, I shall leave others to decide; but of this I am certain, that what with ignorant legislation on the one hand, and vexatious naval interference on the other, our trade on the coast of Africa must soon pass into other hands. No British trader now knows what is to happen to him in conducting his trade there, and no trade can prosper without confidence.

I am sir, your obedient servant,
GEORGE THOMSON.

WEDNESDAY, AUG. 23, 1843.

The Harvest.—The farmers generally in this county have commenced harvest, and have already gathered most part of their wheat and rye. The yield has exceeded their expectations. The oats look well, though mostly short in the straw. The corn and potatoes are somewhat backward, owing to the very dry season, and we should judge the potatoes would fail of being an average crop.

Nauvoo.—At the present time our city presents a most lively and animated appearance, buildings are being erected on every side, and many excellent brick houses have lately been finished. The low part of the town, which in the spring was almost destitute of inhabitants, is now thickly studded with houses and swarming with children.

The Weather.—We have had a dry season, and the gardens, as well as the whole country begins to feel the effects of it. The river is falling very fast.

Right of Visit.—In another column will be seen by a correspondent of the London (Eng.) Herald, that after all the boasted pretensions of the British to the right of visit, that others claim the same privileges as themselves, and that their merchants find it as inconvenient as the American merchants do, when the tables are turned on themselves.—When will this foolish legislation stop?

There seems to be some ground of difficulty between the French and the British in regard to the possession of the Society Island in the Pacific, if as there is a prospect at present, the French and British commanders should have a focus, it is certain the difficulty will not end there. For particulars we refer our readers to another column.

Died.—On Monday the 21st instant, MARY ANN YOUNG, aged 6y and 8m.—She lingered some time with the chills and fever, and was subsequently attacked with the scarlet fever, and afterwards with the dropsy, which, together with an inward canker, terminated her existence. The deceased is a daughter of Elder Brigham Young, who is now on a mission in the east. We feel to sympathize with our beloved brother and family in this dispensation of providence. It must be a severe stroke to Elder Young in his absence. While looking at the corpse we thought we never saw a more angelic form. She was lovely in life, and appeared beautiful even in death, and might indeed be said to be the flower of his flock. She sleeps in peace for a short time, and "we'll not recall her." She will rise in immortal bloom in the resurrection morn. till then we feel persuaded that, although severe the loss, her father and mother and friends will say "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away, and blessed be the name of the Lord."

EARL GARY.—His lordship passed rather a restless night, and the debility he is suffering under is so great, that most anxious fears are entertained for his ultimate recovery.—Lon. Standard.

The War Tent of Washington.—We learn that this venerable relic of revolutionary times, which has been carefully preserved by our patriotic countryman, G. W. P. Curtis, Esq., arrived in Baltimore this morning. It is on its way to Pittsburgh, where it is about to be pitched on the approaching national anniversary, near to the field of Washington's earliest fame. Doubtless it will awaken thrilling recollections of the scenes that occurred at Fort Mifflin and Braddock's fields, and other hallowed spots, where the Father of his country acquired his richest laurels.—Balt. Pat. June 19.

Patronize your own.—An article by Abraham Smith, of Vermont county, a strong writer. He wishes to see the farmer and mechanic strike hands. "Let politicians (says he) extol the benefits of commerce as they will; it will always be found the true interest of the farmer to patronize the mechanic who eats the produce of his farm, and by all means increase, rather than diminish the number of consumers—and the nearer home the better. A sure home market, even if low, is convenient, and not liable to losses from the hundred causes attendant on distant commerce and speculation."

A Marriage Certificate.—An Irish soldier once waited upon his commanding officer with what he termed a very serious complaint. "Another man," he said, "upbraided him that he was not married to his own wife, whom he accused of being no better than she should be, and called her many names besides, which he would be ashamed to mention to his honor." "Well, my good fellow," answered the officer, "have you any proof that you are legally married?" "Faith your honor, I have the best proof in the world."—Here the soldier took off his hat, exhibited a cut skull, saying, "Does your honor think I'd be after taking the same abuse from any body but a wife?"

One Reason for Sleeping Soundly.—An elderly Irishman, examined as witness at the Glasgow Police Court, lately in a case of complaint about a disorderly house, being asked if he usually slept pretty soundly, replied yes; and added as a reason—"Because I am a widower, yer Honor!"

The oat crop is extraordinarily abundant this season in some parts of Kentucky.

A Meteor.—A most splendid meteor fell lately near Mobile. It was most beautiful.

A Fact for the people.—The U. S. consumes more British manufactures than any other nation. Great Britain alone excepted. By a recent report of a committee to the British Parliament it seems that the value of British manufactures consumed by various nations is as follows:

Prussia, 7 cents to each person,

Russia, 15 "

Norway, 17 "

France, 20 "

U. S. States, 402 "

The above from the Montpelier Watchman shows our dependence upon England, and for those articles, too, which we can manufacture as well and as cheap as any other people. She yearly draws over $68,000,000 from us, which ought to remain at home supplying a currency for the people and supporting our own manufactures. Yet the advocates of Free trade would repeal the Tariff, and the protection of our manufactures, and permit England to flood our markets with her goods to the exclusion of our own.

(Ex. Paper.)

Improvement in the Microscope.—An individual in South Leicester, Mass. has communicated to the editor of the Worcester Spy, some astonishing improvements as having been made by him in the Solar Microscope. His improvements consist in representing on the screen the entire object with equal power, and in all the brilliancy of nature's coloring. He then describes the operation of his instrument.

"I can not refrain from mentioning a metamorphosis which I was happy to witness through the agency of our instrument. I had placed the larvae of a fly under the action of three million powers, which gave a representation on the screen twelve feet long. While watching the movements of its breathing apparatus, I perceived the head to be leaving the body, or rather drawing another body with it from the one I was examining. In a few seconds four legs were thrown out, as one would throw out the frame of an umbrella, and floated on the surface of the water.—The insect now measured twenty feet, and a more singular no doubt, cannot be imagined, than was presented in this half aerial; half aquatic existence. Extending from a few feet back of the head to the extremity of the body, as far as it had drawn out, appeared on either side what appeared an ill-furled sail, which by an effort of the insect was immediately flung to the breeze, and lo! a stupendous pair of wings were added to the scene. The old envelope flung away, and before the floated a large sail of air! The entire time from the larva state, swimming in my receiver, till it floated away on wings, did not exceed three minutes. I never, in the widest flight of my imagination, conjured up a sight so amazing as this."

There are other peculiarities about our instrument, which I am not at liberty to mention at present; I will state, however, that in the arrangement and combination of lenses and apertures, we have, in many instances, worked directly opposite to the fundamental laws that have been supposed to govern optics.—Henry Paine.

INDEPENDENCE, Mo., July 23, '43.

MY DEAR OLD FRIEND:

Your letter dated on the 12th, and mailed on the 14th inst., is just at hand, and not being able to answer your questions correctly, or advise you judicially, in relation to the Rockwell case, until after I see him and some others of my friends, I will postpone that part of this letter until tomorrow, and in the meantime will say such things as I can write about without much reflection.

Sheriff Reynolds upon his return, gave me his compliments from you, and for the first time I learned that you resided in Illinois. He also gave a narrative of his adventures in your state, which was any thing but favorable, either to the reputation of your people, or yourself, as a law-abiding people, or a profound or honest lawyer. Certainly there can be but little virtue in the community, and little honesty in the officers of law, who will trample upon the forms of justice; the laws of the country, and bid open defiance to both, in the manner that Sheriff R. informs that you acted with him after his arrest of the Mormon prophet. The state courts have a right, upon a writ of habeas corpus, to investigate the legality of all imprisonments within their respective chartered limits, whether such imprisonment is by the authority of the United States or of a state; no sound lawyer perhaps will doubt; but it is equally certain that no court upon such writ has any right to go beyond the forms and the prima facie evidence of the case. If the officers of courts and the community are so corrupt as to disregard their own laws, and trample them under their feet, and liberate their criminals in defiance of law, then it appears to me that the power of self-government is extinct; if Illinois, by her own authority cannot capture the prophet, it will be but a small matter to release volunteers enough here to raise the cry of Nauvoo to the grounds; if Illinois fails to deliver up Jo Smith, there will be something serious between the two States. Missouri will have Jo Smith for trial or impose as powerful restrictions as the constitution will allow, upon the intercourse of the citizens of Illinois in Missouri. If the Governor of Illinois is so imbecile as to allow his warrant to be disregarded by the Mormons and permit the prophet to go at large, then let him be impeached and a new, honorable, energetic man be placed in his stead. I have it from a high source that Missouri will hold the whole state responsible for the treatment of our messenger, and for the delivery of the prophet. Had you liberated the prophet by a regular writ of habeas corpus, without mistreating our Reynolds, I should have gloried in my acquaintance with you, but to have done it in the manner it was done, reflects no honor either on yourself, your people, or your government. The Mormons are only a lawless banditti, and I fear the pretensions have contaminated the whole community; and if Reynolds' opinions be correct, yourself among the rest. Holy Jo was not afraid of the injustice of our people; it is the just punishment, and their violated laws that he fears.

I will now give you an impartial opinion of the prejudices against Rockwell here, and my opinion of his guilt. There is not a man in this community, but believes him guilty. There is a chain of circumstances against him so strong, that no rational man can doubt his guilt. I was at Bogg's house two minutes after the deed; it is in sight of mine, and the insidiousness of the offence renders it difficult to restrain the citizens from hanging him up without judge or jury. So far however, we have succeeded in quelling it; but should he be discharged upon trial, the power of man cannot save him. (More to-morrow.)

J. HALL.
The foregoing letter was sent from J. Hall, of Independence, Mo., to a respectable lawyer of Dixon, Ill., and by him, with an explanatory letter enclosed and forwarded to Gen. Smith of this city; and, after retaining copies, it was thought advisable to forward both the originals to Governor Ford, for his consideration.—By this proceeding it is not to be understood that the citizens of Nauvoo fear that "volunteers from Missouri will raise Nauvoo to the ground;" there is too much honor and patriotism in Illinois to allow such a barbarous and disgraceful transaction, but it was done to apprise his excellency of the mode and manner of doing business in cases of emergency in Missouri; and to show his excellency how much responsibility he and the state were under in case the prophet should not be delivered up on the requisition of Missouri; where, according to the nicest calculations of the famous lawyer Hall, taking Rockwell's case for a sample, if he was discharged upon his trial, the power of man could not save him!!!

As to the non-intercourse or "restrictions" which Missouri may assume, or inflict over the citizens of Illinois, we have nothing to say. The Latter Day Saints have seen Bogg's signature to such a bill as that, and many know the penalty. There is little need of comment on Mr. Hall's famous letter, for to us it seems to be of itself, a comment that makes honest, virtue, and common sense blush, and law, liberty and republicanism shudder! We appeal to the liberal minded and proud hearted Americans, whether such a spot upon the withering character of Missouri, could be removed any more than an African could be washed white, or a wolf be possessed of the innocence of a lamb, unless the Lord interposed.

Talk of justice in Missouri! You might as well make a burning lime kiln, or coal pit an ice house, or a hospital! The ice would melt, and the sick would suffocate and the power of man could not save them! No wonder a negro could be burnt alive in Missouri! No wonder a criminal could be taken out of jail and murdered while the sheriff held a respite in his hand, in Missouri; and no wonder that a Mormon will not risk his life in Missouri; the power of man cannot save him, even if discharged by what is styled "a court of justice!"

To glance at the whole without recurring to the many crimes of the people of the state, officially or unofficially, whether it be feeding prisoners on "human flesh" or taking them out of jail and lynching them without mercy, to help justice before hand, or whether it be Bogg's exterminating order, or even the present hint of "restriction" and assumption of responsibility; we are apt to believe that the good sense and virtue of the citizens of Illinois in general, and the Mormons especially, like the "old experienced rat," will shun Missouri, as a whited heap under which there is mischief concealed!

For the Nauvoo Neighbor.

OLD HICKORY.

In one of our Liverpool exchange papers, we find the following significant paragraph, showing the state of trade in that country:—

"A Town to let."—A letter from Workington, from which we make the following extract, gives a melancholy picture of the state of trade in that town. "The number of empty houses is immense. In the greatest thoroughfare, say Wilson st. there are several shops and houses closed. The public house in the —, which you sold to Mr. —, has been unoccupied for more than twelve months; in fact, the saying is correct of a town to let. Under these disheartening circumstances, it behooves those who have a trifle not to throw it away."—(Carlisle Journal.) This we believe has been caused by the destruction of the staple trade of the place, the coal trade, its extensive and productive coal mines having been inundated by the sea some five or six years ago.

IRELAND.

Dublin, July 15.—A meeting of the Repeal Association was unexpectedly summoned yesterday, when Mr. O'Connell delivered a long address to members present on the subject of the late debate in the House of Commons, on the motion of Mr. O'Brien. He said the only conclusion to be drawn from that debate was—that repeal was inevitable. Mr. O'Connell gave notice that he would, on the next day of meeting, move for the appointment of arbitrators in every parish in Ireland, with a recommendation to the people not to attend petty sessions, but to have their wrangles decided by these arbitrators. This plan succeeded very well at the time of the Catholic Association, and was likely to succeed much better now.

The following document was read at the last meeting:—

"Sir—With sentiments of profound respect, and feelings of the utmost sincerity, we approach you as the high-minded liberator of our common country, uninfluenced by that baneful and destructive sectarian spirit which has hitherto pervaded so many of the deluded Protestants of Ulster. Too long have we been a divided people—too long have your best endeavours been frustrated by crafty and designing men—too long have the machinations of tyrant rulers been successful to set one class of our countrymen against another class, through political rancour and party feuds. The scales have fallen from our eyes, and he whom we have been taught to consider our most insidious enemy, has by his noble generosity, become our kind and best benefactor.

"We, therefore, the undersigned Orangemen of Stewards town, hereby pledge ourselves that however others may act, we at least will no longer be misled, but that peacefully, legally, loyally, steadily, and perseveringly, we will co-operate with the Repeal Association in their efforts to ameliorate the condition of our countrymen, and as a proof of our determination, we hand you a subscription of 100 associates. We believe their object to be to obtain justice to all without distinction of creed or party—we consider it to be the indefensible right of individuals, as well as nations, to transact their own business; nor can we believe that he who would obtain redress from a common enemy, could seek the aggrandisement of a particular party. It is a godlike principle, not only to forgive dicine, a member of the Medical Society of the city and county of New York, and these Lozenges are prepared from medical prescriptions which have been approved by the most celebrated physicians children eat them with avidity and cry

for more. They consist of

STRAYED FROM THE TEMPLE

ABOUT two months ago a dark brown
Cow, white face, carries her head
high, lop horned, bright eye, a white spot
on one hind foot, white on the end of the tail, white bag, rather short teats, nine years old last spring, she was expected to calve in a few days when she went away;
she is not a very large Cow but pretty stout built.

ALSO, a black Cow, white face, white feet, lower part of tail white, had a dirty
red and white band on her horns across her forehead, she was very poor when she went away, gave a little milk, had no
calf, rather a small sized Cow, and about seven years old as near as can be remembered.

Whoever will give information of either
or both of the Cows to the Temple Committee or the Temple Recorder, or will bring them to the Temple will do us
a favor, and if they desire it a reasonable compensation shall be allowed for trouble and expenses.

The descriptions are as near as can be remembered, but only having them here
a little while it may possibly not be exactly correct.
WM. CLAYTON,
Temple Recorder.
Nauvoo, July 21st, 1843.

LOOK HERE.

I would say to emigrants, and all the brethren, that I have a few lots on hand that I will sell very cheap, as I am going on my mission soon, and wish to sell before I go.

Also, I have lots with buildings on them. If any one wishes for a good store building near the Temple, I can accommodate them.
BRIGHAM YOUNG.
Nauvoo, May 3, 1843. noltf.

pled—"It takes two to make a bargain." So if the legislature should repeal or alter the charter of Nauvoo, without the consent of the citizens, they have only to put a question on the act, through the Supreme Court of the United States; as many other cases have been according to her Reports.

Reserved rights and vested rights are very different, and had the legislature reserved any important point in the charter, and the city council used it, without the consent, mutually of both parties, they would have been held amenable to the supreme court for the usurpation of that power. But when the benefit and convenience of Nauvoo demands ordinances no broader than the constitution of the United States and that of Illinois justifies, no matter whether there is any law on the subject or not, the city council has only to show their wisdom by their ordinances, and their power by their virtues, and how beautifully the world will behold emperium in imperio.

Recently there has been much said about the powers of the Municipal Court of said city; because that court had the right to issue writs of habeas corpus under their own ordinances. Any man that objects to this power of the municipal court, is ignorant of the vested rights of the constitution of the United States, for "the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless, when in cases of rebellion and invasion, the public safety may require it." The highest objection is, that the writ according to the charter, must be confined to cases arising from the ordinances. Just as if the writ was not issued upon the direction and rules of ordinances, what would govern it? Do the circuit and supreme courts of the state issue writs of habeas corpus on the laws of the state, or upon the laws of Spain, Portugal, or the United States? Does the supreme court of the United States exercise the right of habeas corpus upon the United States, or upon an Ukase of the Emperor Nicholas, of Russia?

Again the municipal court of Nauvoo consists of several persons, whereas the circuit court is one man only; and the world has yet to learn that a "little brief authority," is as judiciously exercised by one man as by six—why, the good old Law Book says in the midst of counselors there is safety.

Missouri, of late, made a most desperate and illegal attempt to force the Mormon prophet into her bosom, but met with a most sublime failure. After having been once thrust from her warm embrace by pointed steel and burning sulphur, he seems not anxious to throw himself again upon their renewed offers of hospitality and "pretended justice," yet Gen. Smith treated the agent of the state of Missouri with all due respect; introducing him to his family, and seating him at the head of his table. All is quiet at Nauvoo.

Yours,

VIATOR.

Nauvoo, July 17th, 1843.

"An honest man is the noblest work of God," and if you would attain the distinction of true nobility, you must be scrupulously honest in all your intercourse with your fellow men. Besides gaining their respect and confidence, an approving conscience will clear you onward in the path of truth and virtue.

For the Nauvoo Neighbor.

"Mr. Editor:—Custom," says the proverb with propriety, "is a second nature." Despotism and absolute have been its influences over the opinions of man. Probably greater has been the power of those influences over the sentiments of the great mass of the world's population, than the united power of reason, judgment, and understanding.

As it has been next to impossibility to induce a drunkard to renounce his cups, the epicurean to be satisfied without his dainties, or the sensualist to forego his pleasures, how blighting soever to reputation, and how destructive soever to health and life—so has it been equally, and perhaps more impossible to persuade the Mahometan to abjure the faith of the Alcoran; the Bramin to acknowledge the impositions of the Shaster, the Roman Catholic to confess that some other church might be the "pillar and ground of truth," as well as his own; or any class of men, either in barbarous or civilized life, to renounce their opinions and prejudices, how contrary soever to truth and right-reason, and how incapable soever of standing the test of argument and investigation. The ideas which they acquire, and the sentiments which they imbibe, and the feelings which they cherish in childhood, concerning men and things, concerning theories and institutions, generally strengthen with their strength and increase in influence over their judgments, decisions and actions, as they increase in years, until at length they obtain the entire predominancy—become, as it were, incorporated with the mind and heart, and are interwoven with their every fibre. And that power of argument, illustration and appeal, which shall be able to erase from the memory the deep impressions of those ideas, and to wrench away from the heart, as it were, those sentiments and feelings, entwined as they are with its very texture, must be very nearly allied, in its energies, to omnipotent power—must be almost as efficient as creating power. For in their education, and in the implantation of other and proper ideas sentiments and feelings in their stead, it is necessary, if I may be allowed the expression, to unmake the man, and to make him over again. Custom, then, has opposed an almost insuperable barrier to, all innovations upon established usages, and has guarded the strongholds of error, with a giant's mightiness. Besides the powerful control which custom has exerted over the habits of thinking, feeling and acting, in giving them perpetuity, self-estimation, of a partiality for the opinions of one's own brain, and the practices of one's own self, has contributed very largely to the perpetuity of those habits. Not unfrequently has it barred every intellect to the mind, and every avenue to the heart against the approach of investigation, argument and appeal, with bolts of adamant, and gates impenetrable as brass.—Whenever, in all the different periods of the world's history, attempts have been made to disprove the correctness of opinions, which men have cherished from the days of the nursery, until the maturity of manhood, or the decline of age whenever the validity of positions or premises which have been assumed, and deductions which have been assumed from those premises, and inferences which have been the result of those deductions, have been questioned as illogical—or whenever the perfection of institutions of characters, which have been venerated as immaculate, is doubted.

Not only has the power of habit risen instinctively, and taken a posture of defiance and battle; but every principle of self-complacency has taken the alarm, and cried "to arms!" and both passion and prejudice have been in a bitter crusade against such assaults upon human perfectibility. Especially have they thus risen up in defiance of cherished opinions, and institutions and characters. If to self-estimation, there have been added pride of ancestry, and veneration for it—especially if a long line of progenitors, reaching back to time immemorial, had thought as they thought, had felt as they felt, had acted as they acted, and had trodden in the same beaten pathway in which they were treading—from such premises as these they reasoned, and such conclusions as these, for instance, they drew: "A coincidence with us," said they, "our illustrious forefathers thought, and felt, and conducted so and so, and held the doctrine that such and such sentiments were infallible; and can it be possible that they could have been wrong, venerable as they were, for their gravity, experience, wisdom, and silver locks? Must the clearness and penetration of our views, said they, "the validity of our positions, the soundness of our judgment and logic, the sanctity of our reasoning powers, and correctness of our information, be called in question, supported and confirmed as they have been by the views and positions, the judgment and logic, the learning and reason of a long catalogue of grey-headed ancestry, over whose tomb stones fame and science have thrown a brilliant halo of glory, and whose memories have been embalmed for immortality in story and in song, and in the fond recollections of an admiring posterity? Must these, we repeat, must these be called in question, and doubted, too, by some visionary Mormons, who think themselves wiser than their fathers, but over whose heads only a few suns have rolled, and who, in comparison with those men of silvery locks, can be but children in experience, knowledge and understanding?"

Pride of ancestry, and veneration for it, superadded to self-estimation, put these interrogatories to the innovator; and so put them, as though they could not be satisfactorily answered—so put them in the confident form of a challenge, as though their negative were a self-evident proposition that needed no effort at logical deductions, to make its truth the plainer. Now all this is indeed very plausible, and may sound very well in declamation; but who, if his mental vision be not blinded by prejudice, does not, at a glance, see through the sophistry of such reasoning? Who does not see the premises assumed are false, though the inferences drawn from those premises may be logical? The premises assumed are, that age must have rendered the experienced and talented of other days infallible; and the conclusions drawn are, that their opinions and practices must have also been infallible. The logician, indeed, who reasoned thus, deserved a compliment for their sagacity. They showed that they were acquainted with the human heart—that they understood the true secret spring of human feeling, and of human action, and they understood how to touch the springs effectually—to paralyze the efforts of investigation, when exerted to understand some favorite system—to muzzle the mouth of inquiry, and to make the sophistries and plausibilities of error pass current for sterling truth. An appeal is made, in their behalf, to some of the strongest, and indeed to some of the noblest sympathies of our nature—to our admiration of what is ancient and honorable—to our gratitude for the services of the illustrious dead; and to our veneration for their memories, and for the hallowed chamber where they are sleeping. The silence of the tomb is broken, and strains of moving eloquence the dust of death is made to shake; in language like this, an appeal is made to the innovator:

Will you sacrilegiously disturb the consecrated repose of the illustrious and venerable, and talented of other days? Will you with ruthless hand, force the portals of the tomb, and obscure their fame, and blight their memories, by asserting that they might, peradventure, have felt, and thought, and acted wrong? To support the pretensions of self-estimation to freedom from error, so have pride and ancestry, and veneration for it, reasoned, and so have they appealed to our gratitude for the services, and our veneration for the memories of the departed. Often have they too powerfully and too successfully reasoned and appealed. Often have we been made their converts; and thus by the sophistries of an unsound logic, and by the excitement of noble, yet misdirected sympathies, we have been induced to give perpetuity to falsehood and delusion. In this manner Missouri row reasons, and appeals, and points us to her calendar of saints, and to the abstemiousness and sanctity of her Governor's and laws;—though she be at the same time, grey-headed in iniquity—though her garments are stained and her hands are dripping with the life-blood of martyrs—while up from the deep dungeons of her inquisition, there has come by day and by night, shrieks and groans of mortal agony, which would almost melt a heart of stone to mercy! Besides the deleterious influence of the several causes we have considered, self-interest or avarice has uniformly chilled the spirit of enterprise, clipped the pinions of genius and obstructed the march of improvement; very powerful in the production of evil, as well as in the prevention of good, have been its instrumentalities. With views confined to the circumscribed sphere of private, personal ends, and individual gains—the miser has never looked abroad beyond that circumscribed sphere—he has felt no sympathy for any object beyond it, nor held communion with that object how meritorious soever it might have been—Yea, he has cared for nothing over the wide globe, but the accumulation of wealth—and that has been the strength and predominance of this master passion of the soul that the highest public good and every feeling of humanity have been remorselessly sacrificed upon the altar of avarice. O Missouri! where are yours.

REVIEW OF THE SAINT LOUIS MARKETS. REPUBLICAN OFFICE. St. Louis, August 16th, 1843. WHEAT.—At this season of the year we cannot be much surprised that business should become dull; but the fact that it has been so inactive that we have experienced this season the receipt of all kinds of produce has been very light, and many of the best have withdrawn and hid up for the purpose of waiting before the fall trade commences. The wheat is becoming low all through the valley by the middle and small classes. The Missouri contains 84 to 85 feet water and falling fast. On the lower reaches of the Mississippi there is only 30 inches water, also falling. This limits has 3 feet water, and falling. Low this city to the mouth, there is not 7 feet in the channel. The navigation will continue for several weeks to come even without rain by the smaller class of boats, as the channel is increased in depth, fast as the river falls, by the current. Prices of Tobacco, Hemp, wheat, &c., continue firm and in demand at previous rates, as will be seen by our review below.

Flour.—There is little doing in this article, and the views of dealers are so various in regard to the present aspect of the market, in consequence of the recent advance in New York, and increased operations in New Orleans, that it is difficult to determine what tendency another week will give it. At present the article is flat, nor have we heard of any transactions since our last report of two small lots Country Mills at $3.50; but there are no purchasers at these figures to-day—and one or two late was put in store for which no bids were made. The stock in market is not heavy but is increasing at the City Mills it is retelling at $4 to $4.50. Wheat.—The limited receipts of the last week have occasioned an increased demand, and an advance in price for this article. Yesterday we noticed sales at 65 and 66 cts. There has been very little new wheat come to market, and what we have seen has been of inferior quality. Corn.—The receipts have been more numerous for several days, and the demand is becoming more active. The demand is confined to some extent, and very little has been done in the article. We quote it at 25 to 26 cts without sacks. Oats.—Some demand exists to supply the wants of the city, the receipts having been very light the last week. We quote sales at 18 to 20 cts without sacks. Barley.—Barley has become scarce, and we advance our figures for good country cured to 34 to 40 cts.

We are authorized to announce DAVID GREENLEAF as a candidate for Probate Justice of the Peace of Hancock county, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of General James Adams. 18-16

We are requested to announce JOHN A. FORGEUS as a candidate for the office of Probate Justice of Hancock county, at the election to be held on Monday the 11th day of September next. 18-16

THESE celebrated Lozenges are now offered to the citizens of Nauvoo

which they are recommended) ever offered to the public. The proprietor, Dr.
Sherman, is a regular graduate of Medicine, a member of the Medical Society of the city and county of New York, and
these Lozenges are prepared from medical prescriptions which have been approved by the most celebrated physicians in that city; in addition to which they are prepared in so pleasant a manner that children eat them with avidity and cry
for more. They consist of
COUGH LOZENGES.
Which are the safest and most effectual remedy for Coughs, Colds, Consumption, Whooping Cough, Asthma, &c. &c. ever offered to the public. They operate by promoting expectoration, allaying the irritation of coughing, and removing the cause of the disease.

WORM LOZENGES.
The only infallible Worm medicine ever discovered. In over 400,000 cases they have never been known to fail. Many diseases arise from worms and occasion long and intense suffering and even death, without their ever being suspected; grown persons are very often afflicted with them, and are doctored for various complaints, without any benefit, when one dose of these Lozenges would speedily cure them.

CAMPHOR LOZENGES.
For Nervous or Sick Head Ache, Palladium or the Heart, lassitude and nervous affections generally. Persons travelling or attending large parties, will find the Lozenges really reviving, and imparting the buoyancy of youth—used after dissipation, they will restore the tone of the system generally, and remove all the unpleasant symptoms arising from too free living.

CATHARTIC LOZENGES.
The best Cathartic medicine for removing bile from the system and preventing attacks of the bilious and intermittent fe-celebrated physician in a practice of twenty years, and have never been known to fail in removing the distressing disease. In addition to which, if the directions be followed, the disease will not return.

STRAYED FROM THE TEMPLE
ABOUT two months ago a dark brown
Cow, white face, carries her head
high, lop horned, bright eye, a white spot
on one hind foot, white on the end of the tail, white bag, rather short teats, nine
years old last spring, she was expected to
calve in a few days when she went away;
she is not a very large Cow but pretty
stout built.

ALSO, a black Cow, white face, white
feet, lower part of tail white, had a dirty
red and white band on her horns across
her forehead, she was very poor when
she went away, gave a little milk, had no
calf, rather a small sized Cow, and about seven years old as near as can be remembered.

Whoever will give information of either
or both of the Cows to the Temple Committee or the Temple Recorder, or
will bring them to the Temple will do us
a favor, and if they desire it a reasonable compensation shall be allowed for trouble and expense.

The descriptions are as near as can be remembered, but only having them here
a little while it may possibly not be exactly correct.

POETRY.

TO A LADY.

BY FREDERIC MILLEN.

O couldst thou know how oft I've stood
Amid the dark wood's solitude,
And thought on thee, thou wouldst not know
Crush my poor heart, and o'er that brow
Which throws around all but me
A lustrous glow so playfully.
Cast that dark veil which chills the heart,
Whose gleams, only, light thou art.

I've stood with thee when through the sky,
The golden moon moved silently;
And mid the eyes that worship there,
To me there was not one so fair
Nor yet so dear as that blue eye,
Whose heavenly tranquility
Beamed upward to that glittering star,
As it found a dwelling there.

Dost thou remember when we stood Gazing along the slumbering flood:
While moonlight waves were hushed to rest,
Family and low across their breast
Sweet music stole? I mark'd thee then—
For thou wert wrapt from earth and men,
And thy pure soul looked smilingly,
And seem'd for brighter worlds to sigh.

As thy eye flow from star to star,
I deem'd thee brighter, dearer far
Than those fair orbs whose golden light,
Flung the soft lustre through the night,
And when thou turn'dst to earth again,
I saw that brightness still remain;
As if that intercourse had given
To thy fair brow the smile of heaven.

I've stood beside thee when the song
Flow'd from thy lips, and oh how strong
My throbbing heart dwelt on the string,
To catch those soft notes murmuring,
And when my soul was dark and sad,
They'd softly send their echoes glad
To soothe its woes—though not for me,
Were fram'd those notes of harmony.

Well, be it so! if I but dwell Within thy sight—to worship still
To hear thy voice—to see thy smiles,
Whose blushing light all care beguiles;
I will forgive thee, mayst thou live
In all the joys that life can give,
And when thy course of life is run,
And thou art gone—God's will be done.

From the Public Ledger, July 3.

AWFUL CALAMITY!—GREAT FLOOD AT CHESTER—LOSS OF LIFE AND PROPERTY.

The storm of Saturday last prevented the Southern mail from reaching this city by the regular route. The following letter, which we have received from Chester, by a private hand, gives a full account of the terrible disasters in that neighborhood. It bears the date of Sunday, and comes from a gentleman who was in the vicinity at the time:

"Chester and its vicinity are bowed down beneath the chastening hand of Providence. The borough and its neighborhood present scenes of desolation, such as in the absence of the terrors of war, have never been witnessed in this State. Our shores are strewn with wrecks, our streets filled with ruin, and from every section we hear tales of terror and desolation and death, sufficient to appal the stoutest heart. The recent rain had fully saturated the soil, and that of yesterday therefore flowed from the surface. In the afternoon the rain became heavy beyond description. It fell as if in a mass. The very hills were sheeted with water; and in the valleys, runlets became creeks, and creeks were swollen into rivers. A freshet was of course anticipated; but a flood, such as ensued, could not have been apprehended. It is said that the passengers in the afternoon boats saw a water-spout burst upon the heights between Ridley and Chester creeks; but though an ordinary fall of rain, however copious, seems inadequate to have produced the subsequent flood, and there is no satisfactory evidence of the existence of a water-spout.

"Fortunately, this took place before dark, or the scene would have been even more terrible than it was. In Chester, the torrent rose as if by magic, and swept angrily through the streets. The buildings, which were most frail, were swept away; and from others, females were borne through the angry and rushing waters, half dead with affright. Houses, dams, bridges, boats, and an immense mass of lumber, furniture, mill-wheels, &c., shot by upon the current. At length, while the assembled citizens gazed, with white lips, on the ruin, the railroad bridge, built at an enormous expense, was lifted from its foundations and flung down the stream. The next to follow was the suspension bridge. The structure was one of which every enlightened American was proud, as it was the first chain-bridge built in the World.

"The factories of Mr Crozier, Mr Dickinson, Mr Riddle, and others, have been swept away. Immense numbers of bales of cotton, boxes of goods, barrels of dye-wood and barrels of flour, have been carried down to Delaware, or scattered upon the meadows in which the flood in its fury broke and deposited its spoil. It is believed that all the dams are gone. The pecuniary loss to individuals is frightfully great; and that which has fallen upon the county is not less appalling. The lowest estimate of loss is $2,500,000; but this is made up, to a great extent, upon conjecture. The county will probably be constrained to raise, by loan, the means of constructing her bridges, as all intercourse between the different sections of the county is now cut off.

"But the loss of property, terrible as it is, is inconsiderable to the loss of life with which this affliction of Providence has been attended. It is believed that not less than twenty, and probably as many more, persons have been drowned. At one place on the Ches or creek, an entire family, that of Mr Rhoads, consisting of himself, wife, and two small children, found it impossible, so instantaneous was the rise and rush of the torrent, to escape the house, and all perished. At the Flower Mills, a devoted mulatto woman, finding that Mr Flower was in great danger, attempted to rescue him, but the sudden dash of the flood swept her away, and she was engulfed. Mr Flower, who was in an upper story of the mill, leaped from the window into a tree; here he remained until the torrent torn up the tree and swept it onward. He, however, succeeded in getting hold of the branches of another tree that resisted the tide, and he was saved. Several bodies have been found upon the shore and in the meadows. This fatality is to be ascribed to the unparalleled suddenness of the rise of the water. It was as if the earth had opened and poured forth her secret flood. Scarcely was the presence of danger known, before it was followed by the absence of hope. Hundreds of hair-breadth escapes are narrated. The whole country is over spread with gloom, and the consequences of last night's calamities will long overshadow the prosperity of this lovely section of country."

We learn further that five persons were drowned at Bancroft's, on Ridley creek. Fifty bridges in the county, it is said, can be counted destroyed, together with almost every mill-dam. Mr Crozier's loss is supposed to be from $50 to $75,000. Kitt's pattern shop is gone, Mr Benton's house, Wm Kerlin's, Mr Wm Eyre's board yard swept away, Joshua P & Wm Eyre's storehouse completely emptied.—Jesse M Eyre, suffered great loss in store goods. On Ridley creek we have heard of four bridges being carried away, and a number of houses. It is probable there are many more. The railroad bridges over Ridley, Crum, and Darby, are not gone.

CANDOR OF HUSBAND AND WIFE.

A WHISPER TO THE HUSBAND.

The happiness of the wife is committed to the keeping of the husband; prize the sacred trust, and never give her cause to repent the confidence she has reposed in you. In contemplating her character recollect the materials human nature is composed of, and do not expect perfection.

Do justice to her merits and point out her faults; for I do not ask you to treat her errors with indulgence, but then endeavor to amend them with wisdom, gentleness and love. Do not jest about the bonds of a married state. Make it an established rule to consult your wife on all occasions. Your interest is hers; and undertake no plan contrary to her advice and approbation; then if the affair turns out ill, you are spared reproaches both from her and your own feelings. There is in woman an intuitive quickness, a sagacity, a penetration and foresight into the probable consequences of an event, that make her peculiarly calculated to give opinion and advice.

If you have any male acquaintances, whom, on reasonable grounds, your wife wishes to resign, do so. Never witness a quarrel from your wife with apathy or indifference. Words, looks, actions—all may be artificial; but a tear is unequivocal; it comes direct from the heart, and speaks at once the language of truth, nature and sincerity! Be assured, when you see a tear on her cheek her heart is touched, and do not, I again repeat do not behold it with coldness or insensibility.

Let contradiction be avoided at all times.

Never upbraid your wife with the meanness of her relations; invectives against herself are not half so wounding. Should suffering of any kind assail your wife, your tenderness and attention are particularly called for. A look of love, a word of pity or sympathy, is sometimes better than medicine.

Never reproach your wife with any personal or mental defect; for a pain face sometimes conceals a heart of exquisite sensibility and merit, and her consciousness of the defect in her awakens to the slightest attention or inattention. When in the presence of others, let your wife's laudable pride be indulged by your showing you think her an object of importance and preference. The most trivial word or act of attention and love from you gratifies her feelings; and a man never appears to more advantage than by proving to the world his affection and preference for his wife.

Never run on in enthusiastic eulogiums on other women in presence of your wife: she does not love you better for it. Much to be condemned is a married man constantly rambling from home for the purpose of passing a way time. Surely, if he wants employment, his house and grounds will furnish him with it, and if he wishes for society, he will find it in his wife, children and books, the best society in the world.

There are some men who will sit an entire day with their wives, and scarcely a word escape their lips. This is wrong; you should converse freely on all such occasions. Be always cheerful, gay and good humored. When abroad do not avoid speaking to your wife.—Few women are insensible of tender treatment. They are naturally frank and affectionate; and in general there is nothing but austerity of look or distance of behaviour, that can prevent those amiable qualities from being evinced on all occasions.

When absent, let your letters to your wife be warm and affectionate. A woman's heart is peculiarly formed for tenderness; and every expression and endearment of the man she loves is flattering and pleasing to her.

A husband whenever he goes from home should always endeavor to bring some little present to his wife. In pecuniary matters do not be parsimonious or too particular. Your wife has an equal right with yourself to all your worldly possessions. Besides, really a woman has innumerable trifling demands on her purse, many little wants which it is not necessary for a man to be informed of and which even if he went to the trouble of investigating, he could not understand.

A WHISPER TO THE WIFE.

Study your husband's temper and character; and be it your pride and pleasure to conform to his wishes. Check at once the first advances to contradiction, even of the most trivial nature.—Beware of the first dispute.

Whatever would have been concealed as a defect from the lover, must with great diligence be concealed from the husband.—The most intimate and tender familiarity cannot surely be supposed to exclude decorum.

Let your husband be dearer and of more consequence to you than any other human being; and have no hesitation in confessing those feelings to him.

Endeavor to make your husband's habitation alluring and delightful to him. Let it be a sanctuary to which his heart may always turn from the ills and anxieties of life.

I know not two female attractions so captivating to us as delicacy and modesty.

If possible, let your husband suppose you think him a good husband, and it will be a strong stimulus to his being so.

No attraction renders a woman at all times so agreeable to her husband as cheerfulness and good humor.

In the article of dress, study your husband's taste, endeavor to wear what he thinks becomes you.

Make yourself as useful to him as you can, and let him see you employed as much as possible in economical pursuits.

Endeavor to feel pleased with your husband's friends.

How indecorous and offensive it is to see a woman exercising authority over her husband and saying, "I will have it so." "It shall be done as I like," &c.

Never join in any jest or laugh against your husband.

Assiduously conceal his faults and speak only of his merits.

In married life, confidants are by no means desirable.

Conceal from others any little discord or disunion that occurs between you and your husband.

Never receive the particular attentions of any other men.

Be you ever so conscious of a superiority of judgment or talent, never let it appear to your husband.

Shun extravagance. Attention to order and regularity will contribute much to the comfort of your husband.

A woman never should appear untidy or badly when in the presence of her husband.

Let home be the sole scene of your wishes, your plans, your exertions.

There is an old observation that a mother and daughter in law are natural enemies. But let your manner to relations in-law be particularly kind and considerate.

In your manner to your servants, be firm without being severe, and kind without being familiar. Let your commands to your servants be consistent and reasonable; and then firmly but mildly insist on obedience to them. It is very disheartening to a poor servant to be continually found fault with. Praise and reward them when you can; human nature will not bear a constant chiding.

HEROISM OF AN AFGHAN GIRL.

An Ungazetted Trail of Ghisnee.

While the Afghans were disputing our entrance into the citadel, an accident occurred, which for a moment diverted the attention of the combatants and turned their fury into pity. Amongst the foremost of the party who signalled themselves by their desperate gallantry was an aged chieftain, the riches of whose costume excited general attention, his turban and weapons being resplendent with jewels. The hopes of plunder immediately marked him out as an object of attack, and numbers at once assailed him. He defended himself like a man who knew that there was no chance for life, but who was resolved to sell it as dearly as he could. He had killed several of the Queen's Royals, and severely wounded Capt. Robinson, when a grenadier of the company to which the latter belonged, seeing his officer in danger, rushed to his assistance and brought the old chieftain to the ground. The grenadier was about to despatch him, when a beautiful girl, about seventeen, threw herself into the melee, and plunged a dagger in his breast. She then cast herself on the body of the chieftain, for the purpose of propping it up, and the Afghans forming a sort of rampart before them, maintained their ground until the heroic girl succeeded in getting conveyed into the centre of the citadel. Shortly after the place was taken, she was found weeping over the remains of her brave old man; who on enquiry was found to be her father. She was treated with the utmost respect and tenderness by our men; who neither obtruded themselves on her grief, nor offered any interruption to the preparation which she had made for interment.—English Paper.

MARRIED ALMOST.—A Narrow Escape.

A laughable mistake occurred at the performance of a marriage ceremony at one of our churches yesterday morning, which came very near proving serious, and marrying off a young man in the prime of life without previous forethought or warning, and illustrating practically the danger of going a gunning, unless well skilled in the use of arms. When the parties appeared before the altar, the Rector taking the groomman to be the happy man, placed him alongside of the lovely bride, asked him his name, and proceeded with the ceremony, and had got half way through the first paragraph before the astonished groom recovered self-possession to stop the worthy Rector and inform him that he was the assistant and not the principal. An exchange of places was soon made and the services concluded without interruption; all returning from the church well satisfied that the affair was terminated as at first designed. We understand that the groomman has firmly resolved that he will not place himself in so dangerous a position again, and that next time he stands before the altar, he will stand there on his own account and not as second for another.—Clev Her.

EXTRAORDINARY RISE IN THE MONONGAHELA.

The late rise in the Monongahela was one of the most remarkable which has occurred for many years. We are informed by 'old residents' that they do not recollect any similar one to have taken place within their memories. In mid-summer, during a drought, to see a large river rise in one day seven or eight feet, and that without rain in the immediate vicinity, is, to say the least, remarkable. We are informed by a gentleman from up the Monongahela that at one point there was fourteen feet of a rise on Thursday. This must have partially spent itself before it reached the city, as the water was not so high here. It came down like a swell.

We hear that there was no rain this side Morgantown, Virginia; and yet a few miles up the Monongahela large trees have floated down, which have been torn up by the roots. We shall expect to hear of a tremendous rain having occurred at the sources of the river, if not of a cloud bursting, or a water spout. The river is now in fine navigable condition for the largest class of boats, and will probably so continue for some time to come.

In fact, navigation is never suspended here, for a large number of boats have been built here of late years, which can pass up and down in the very lowest stages of the river, and carry both freight and passengers at reasonable rates.—Pittsburg Chronicle.

Cannibalism.—Gen. Cass mentions in his oration, at Fort Wayne, on the 4th inst., what will probably be new to most readers, that the powerful tribe of Indians who formerly occupied that country, had a 'Man-eating Society.' We give the extracts:—'It is forty three years since I landed upon the northern shore of Ohio, a young adventurer seeking the land of promise, which has been to him, as to many others, the land of performance. At that time the Territory of Osageons formed one government, under the name of the North western Territory. I shall not stop to bring before you the incidents of a frontier life, nor the difficulties and privations and sufferings, in peace and war, by which the forest is acquired and reclaimed, and finally subdued. During many years this region had its full share of troubles. The line of your canal was a bloody war path, which has seen many a deed of horror. And this peaceful town had its Moloch, and the records of human depravity furnish no more terrible examples of cruelty than were offered at his shrine. The Miami Indians, our predecessors in the occupation of this district, had a fearful institution, whose origin and objects have been lost in the darkness of aboriginal history, but which was continued to a late period, and whose orgies were held upon the very spot where we now are. It was called the Man-eating Society, and it was the duty of its associates to eat such prisoners as were preserved and delivered to them for that purpose. The members of this society belonged to a particular family, and the dreadful inheritance descended to all the children, male and female. The duties imposed could not be avoided, and the sanctions of religion were added to the obligations of immemorable usage.—The feast was a solemn ceremony, at which the whole tribe was collected, as actors or spectators. The miserable victim was bound to a stake, and burned at a slow fire, with all the refinements of cruelty, which savage ingenuity could invent. There was a traditional ritual, which regulated with revolting precision, the whole course of procedure at these ceremonies. Later, the authority and obligations of the institution had declined, and I presume it has now disappeared. But I have seen and conversed with the head of the family, the chief of the society, whose name was White Skin. With what feelings of disgust, I need not attempt to describe. I well know an intelligent Canadian, who was present at one of the last sacrifices made to this horrible institution. The victim was a young American, captured in Kentucky, during the revolutionary war. Here, where we are now assembled in peace and security, celebrating the triumph of art and industry, within the memory of the present generation, our countrymen have been thus tortured, and murdered, and devoured. But thank God, the council fire is extinguished.—The impious feast is over.'—[N Y Sun.

Alas, the Bachelor!—We dropped in suddenly on a bachelor acquaintance, the other day, and just as we made our appearance, he put something in his pocket very hurriedly, and looked as guilty as if he had been caught kissing a spinster. We cast our eyes at his pocket, and half way out hung the secret. It was his stocking! The poor miserable fellow had been darning it and it astonished us to see what perfection he had arrived at in that branch of home industry. You may give him up, girls.—[Exch. paper.

The First Bank in America.—It has been the general opinion that the first bank in America was the Bank of North America, established in Philadelphia. The Cincinnati Chronicle, whose editor has been dipping into the antiquities of the country, says that seventy years before the Bank of North America, the Legislature of South Carolina established a Public Bank, and issued forty-eight thousand pounds in bills of trust. These bills were called bank bills, and the establishment was called a public bank. These were lent out at interest, or loaned on personal security.

Important Discovery.—On the farm of

Gen. Thomas C. Miller, in Dickinson township, Cumberland county, Pennsylvania, there has recently been discovered an immense vein of pure red Ochre, of the finest quality, second only to the finest Venetian red. Gen. Miller is now preparing it in large quantities for the market. Its purity is such that it requires but to be dried in the sun and ground to be used for the finest painting. From the appearance of the mine it is supposed there is an amount sufficient to supply the whole United States.

The average deficiency, it will be seen, is about 10,000,000 bushels. We have before assumed that the surplus produce of Canada is small, if indeed there be any surplus, and that this demand must be supplied, either from the United States or the continent of Europe. It has been suggested in some quarters that we cannot compete profitably with the wheat growing countries on the Mediterranean or Black Seas, where labor is worth next to nothing. A few facts will show what we have to apprehend from that quarter. Pending the agitation of the corn law question, extensive investigations were ordered by Parliament, and very minute information respecting all the grain growing countries of Europe was obtained. The result showed satisfactorily that little reliance can be placed in the continent for a supply. The greatest surplus quantity of wheat which the whole continent of Europe could supply under the most favorable circumstances, was shown to be a little over 17,000,000 bushels. The reports concurred in stating that the crops on the continent are as precarious as in England, and in some other countries more so, besides the governments frequently, where there is any apprehension of a scarcity, prohibit the exportation. A nation, dependant on foreigners for a portion of her bread stuff every year, cannot rely on a market so uncertain.

The investigation alluded to above also shows that the average cost of continental wheat at Liverpool, not including duty, was £2 6s 4d a quarter or $1.25 a bushel; and the average duty under the sliding scale about 55 cents a bushel, to which all wheat, except from British provinces, is still subject, and the cost of wheat is raised to $1.80. Now we will see for how much American wheat can be delivered at Liverpool, duty paid. We will take the present prices at Cleveland, which is certainly above a fair average—Cost of a bushel of wheat at Cleveland, $1.00 Freight to Liverpool via Montreal, 30 Canadian and British duty, 12

Cost of continental wheat, $3.42

Difference in favor of America, 38

The commissioners and other incidental charges, we have supposed, the same in both cases. The difference is enough to put an end to competition. Another advantage the Canadian wheat has over the continental, is, that while the former is to be admitted at fixed duty, the latter is subject to all the fluctuations of the sliding scale. When a shipment is ordered from Odessa or Danzig, the duty may be 30 cents a bushel; but when the cargo arrives it may have risen to 60.

Persons from Nauvoo state, that it is understood there and it is so expressed by every body, that in consequence of the Mormons voting for Hoge, no more writs will be issued for Joseph Smith. We trust that this agreement will not be broken. We should be sorry, indeed, to see Governor Ford issue another writ on the eve of an election. We are sure he will not do it, unless he considers there is danger threatened to the constitution.—Sanguine Journal.

A Floral Curiosity.—We have often heard of a white black-bird, but never till now of a green rose: yet such a one has been produced in Bladen, N. Carolina. This change in the color of the flower is supposed to have been effected by setting out a common daily rose bush in the spot from which a sumach bush had just been removed, and it is believed that the roots of the two mingled.

[Augusta (Ga.) Chronicle.

Doing Good.—How often do we weigh for opportunities of doing good, whilst we neglect the openings of Providence in little things which would frequently lead to the accomplishment of most important usefulness! Dr. Johnson used to say, 'He who wants to do a great deal of good at once, will never do any.' Good is done by degrees. However small in proportion the benefit which follows individual attempts to do good, a great deal may thus be accomplished by perseverance even in the midst of discouragements and disappointments.—Crabbe.

Raising the Wind.—An ingenious, but not altogether original expedient for raising the wind, was put into successful operation in the upper part of New York the other day by a female dressed in plain and decent garb, and of rather respectable appearance. She went into the house of an old gentleman, and presenting the compliments of the lady who lived next door, asked the loan of two dollars till next morning. The old gentleman had not 2, but handed her a $5 bill and requested her to return the balance. The successful lady then went to the next house, and there on a similar pretence, obtained $5 more and of course, immediately decamped. Benevolent, obliging people, ought to be on their guard.—Boston Mail.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAM SHIP
HIBERNIA.

Sixteen Days Later from England.
The Hibernia sailed from Liverpool on the afternoon of the 4th instant, and brings London and Liverpool papers of that date. She arrived at Halifax on the 16th instant, at eight o'clock, a. m., and sailed for Boston the same day at 11 o'clock a. m., and arrived at her wharf in East Boston, at 10 o'clock last night. She took her pilot last evening at 8. Her passage was thirteen days.

The news is not of any great and exciting interest. In Ireland and Spain, however, affairs are of a character calculated to arrest the attention of diplomatists, statesmen and lovers of liberty and reform.

The Hibernia, on her last trip home, made the passage in less than Nine Days.

The Steamer Pegasus, running between Leith and Hull, has been lost, and about 50 persons drowned.

Dr. Orville Dewey, the distinguished American writer and preacher, is on a visit to that country, and has occupied the pulpits of several Unitarian chapels in and near the metropolis.

The Right Honorable, the Earl of Glasgow, died at Edinburgh on Thursday week.

The Honorable Abbott Lawrence, late Representative of the city of Boston, in the House of Representatives of the United States, had arrived with his family at the Brunswick Hotel, Hanover square.

The Glasgow underwriters will suffer very severely by the loss of the Columbia steamer, which was principally insured at that city. The amount is stated at upwards of 40,000, underwritten by several of the most influential brokers.

IRELAND.—The National publishes a third list of subscriptions in France, in favor of the repeal agitation in Ireland. It amounts to 412 francs, 50 centimes—making the total amount subscribed 1,137 francs 50 centimes.

The following appears in the Naval and Military Gazette:—

The Duke of Wellington is prepared to concentrate the troops in Ireland, and all the small detachments will be called in; barracks, long unoccupied, are ordered to be furnished for the accommodation of troops; and stations where, of late, only a company was quartered, will have a complete regiment. Far more is doing towards placing the country in a state to be defended than merely meets the eye. Troops are at the most convenient points for transmission; and we know that arms and ammunition are disposed at safe places in this country for their being sent over when circumstances shall require it.

Another large Repeal meeting took place on the 21st ult. It was numerously attended.

The dinner took place in a large room of the Mitre Hotel, accommodating about 400 gentlemen, and nearly half the number of ladies as spectators.

Mr. O'Connell addressed the company for upwards of an hour. They had arrived, he said, at a crisis which would leave Ireland a degraded and pitiful province for centuries, or raise her at once to the dignity of a national independence. While compelling England to do them justice, they never omitted to warn her that they were agitators with ulterior views, and that they had in contemplation the nationality of Ireland. Mr. O'Connell alluded to the myriads of determined repealers who had attended the several repeal demonstrations, observing that even if England were in a state of perfect prosperity, Ireland now possessed a moral force sufficient to break down every barrier that stood in the way of her independence; but, instead of that, the manufacturers of England are declining, and her revenue, notwithstanding the income tax, was diminishing. (A voice, "More of that to her!") Right, more of that to her, until she did justice to Ireland, and then might enjoy prosperity and glory attend her march. He proceeded to show that the condition of Spain, the offer of support from France, and the well attested sympathy of America, made England very insecure while Ireland was dissatisfied.

Nothing but fear kept her at present from attempting to coerce Ireland; for when was she strong that she did not do so? As soon as she found that she could not cut their throats, she resolved to bully them, and out came the threat of civil war from Peel and Wellington, who are now neither for coercion, threats, nor civil war, but for doing nothing.

The "Times," too, bullied and blustered, and called the Ministers traitors for not cutting the throats of the Repealers; but now what said that journal? Why, that Repeal was a joke, and the government, forsooth, were to cut their throats for a joke. (Laughter.) The Whig publications said, "Let the Irish go on and they will grow tired." [A voice, they lie!] It was not so easy to tire him, at least.

(Cheers.) The Whigs said, "Wait a while, and when we get into power, we will give you everything." Would the men of Galway grow tired to gratify the Tories? (No, no!) Or would they wait for the Whigs? (No, no!) They must not then be content with meetings, or with giving a passing cheer; they must work in their respective parishes with a view to make every man a Repealer, and should have as little as possible to do with any man that refuses to become one.

CHINA.—The news from China is extremely scanty. Reports had been circulated of Sir Henry Pottinger's sickness, but they were regarded as exaggerations. He was said, according to the latest news of the beginning of May, to be waiting for the arrival of the new Imperial Commissioner, Ke Ying, who was expected at Canton about the beginning of June.

The death of Captain Farmer, of Her Majesty's ship Driver, was mentioned.

The Phlegethon had arrived at Calcutta on the 7th of June, from Hong Kong 7th of May.

The Queen steamer had been ordered to get ready for sea at Calcutta in the beginning of July. Some of the newspapers imagine that Lord Ellenborough is going back to Europe; but this fact may be doubted in the middle of the south-west monsoon.

June 19, 6 o'clock.—A letter from Hong Kong has arrived, dated March 7th. From it, it appears that business was most active to the north. There were seven ships in the Yang-Tze-Kiang, selling openly, at Woosung opium and British goods. They had been warned off by the authorities, but having persisted, they were allowed to continue their sales.

The Americans are busy in smuggling. Sir Henry Pottinger sought to stop the trade, but in vain. Captain Hope endeavored to detain some vessels, but they were subsequently released.

THE BLACKSMITH.

We have given you some instances of courage and heroic daring among those high in station, and renowned in fame. One instance more—an example of reckless courage. The hero was a stout blacksmith—aye, an humble blacksmith, but his stout frame, hardened by toil, throbbled with as generous an impulse of freedom as ever beat in the bosom of a La Fayette, or throbbled around the heart of mad Anthony Wayne.

It was in the full time of the retreat, that a follower of the American camp, who had at least shouldered a cart-whip in his country's service, was driving a baggage wagon from the battlefield, while some short distance behind a body of Continentals were rushing forward, and a troop of Britishers in close pursuit.

The wagoner had arrived at a narrow point of the bye-road leading to the south, where two high banks of rock and crag arising on either side, afforded just space sufficient for the passage of his wagon, and not an inch more.

His eye was arrested by the sight of a stout, muscular man, some forty years of age, extended at the foot of a tree at the very opening of this pass. He was clad in the coarse attire of a mechanic—his coat had been flung aside, and with the shirt sleeves rolled up from his muscular arms, he lay extended on the turf, with his rifle in his grasp, while the blood streamed in a torrent from his right leg, broken at the knee by a cannon ball.

The wagoner's sympathies were arrested by the sight—he would have paused in the very instant of his flight, and placed the wounded blacksmith in his wagon, but the stout-hearted mechanic refused.

"I'll not get into your wagon," he exclaimed, in his rough way; "but I'll tell you what I will do. Do you see yonder cherry tree on top of that rock that hangs over the road? Do you think you could lift a man of my build up that? For you see, neighbor," he continued, while the blood flowed from his wound, "I never meddled with these Britishers until they came tramping over this valley, and burned my house down. And now I'm all riddled to pieces, and haint got more than fifteen minutes life in me! But I have got three good rifle balls in my cartridge box, and to just prop me up against that cherry tree, and I'll give 'em the whole three shots, and then," he exclaimed, with an oath, "and then I'll die!"

The wagoner started his horses ahead, and then with a sudden effort of strength, dragged the blacksmith along the sod to the foot of the cherry tree surmounting the rock by the road-side.

In a moment his back was propped against the tree, his face was toward the advancing troops, and while his shattered leg hung over the bank, the wagoner rushed on his way, and the blacksmith very coolly proceeded to load his rifle.

It was not long before a body of American soldiers rushed by, with the British in pursuit. The blacksmith greeted them with a shout, and then raising his rifle to his shoulder, he picked the foremost from his steed, with the exclamation, "That's for General Washington!" In a moment the rifle was again loaded, again was it fired, and the pursuing British rode over the body of another fallen officer. "That's for myself!" cried the blacksmith. And then with a hand strong with the feeling of coming death, the sturdy freeman again loaded, again raised his rifle. He fired his last shot, and as another officer kissed the sod, a tear quivered in the eye of the dying blacksmith, "And that," he cried, with a husky voice, which strengthened into a shout, "And that's for Mad Anthony Wayne!"

Long after the battle was past, his body was discovered, propped against the tree, with the features frozen in death, smiling grimly, whilst the right hand grasped the never-failing rifle.

And thus died one of the ten thousand brave mechanic heroes of the Revolution—brave in the hour of battle—undaunted in the hour of retreat—undismayed in the hour of death.

THE NEIGHBOR.

WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 6, 1843.

The Weather.—The dry season seems to be gone and past, and the long drought has been succeeded by several refreshing showers.

We have nothing of particular interest in our European news this week. O'Connell is still agitating the repeal question in Ireland; and while the attention of the British Parliament seems to be wholly engrossed with the subject.

Depredations are still being committed in Wales, by 'Rebecca and her Daughters,' and more efficient measures have been taken to put a stop to these lawless outbreaks.

Nauvoo still continues on the even tenor of her way; buildings are progressing rapidly on every hand, and whichever way you turn your attention, the spirit of improvement and enterprise is abundantly manifested. She is speedily destined to be the great emporium of the west.

We have been solicited to publish articles setting forth the good qualities of the candidates for the office of Probate Justice; but have declined publishing them; as we wish not to interfere in such matters. We suppose they are both good men,—both competent to fulfil the office with honor and dignity; relative to the choice of the men, the people must be the judge;—and as far as we are concerned we would rather see them go in on their "own hook."

Average mortality of Mankind.—The population of the whole earth has been variously estimated between eight hundred thousand and a million million souls. According to the English pocket diary, if we fix upon an intermediate number, say 946,080,000, and assign thirty years for the continuance of each generation, we shall find that the children of men come into the world and go out in the following average:

Every moment	1
Every minute	60
Every hour	3,600
Every day, 24 hours	86,400
Every week, 7 days	604,800
Every month, 30 days	2,592,000
Every year, 365 days	32,536,000
Every generation, 30 years	946,080,000

It thus appears that every stroke of the pendulum usher a human being into existence and heralds the departure of another to that vast bourne from whence no traveller returns. It would be well that all should ponder and consider the certainty of the latter great event, and set their house in order as becometh good members of society, having the interest of their parents, children or relations at heart, by endeavoring, while they have the opportunity to study their welfare by securing life in a better world.

Specie of the World.—The entire amount of specie of the world is estimated by Jacobus at $1,900,000,000. In Europe there is supposed to be $1,000,000,000. According to the best authorities, it is supposed that the paper circulation in Europe is fourteen times the specie currency.

A Curious Circumstance.—The St. Clair county (Ill.) Banner says, that a "Mr. John M. Geel, of Port Huron, in that county, commenced near his house boring for water, and after having sunk a shaft to the depth of 115 feet, he suddenly heard a hissing noise, which he supposed to be water rising where he had bored. He immediately commenced taking up his shaft, which as soon as he had done, was followed by a noise as loud as and resembling that made by the largest steamboat letting off steam, and a rush of gas, throwing stones, sand, &c., to the length of 100 feet, and with such force as to throw stones weighing from five to ten pounds, when placed in the orifice, to the height of several feet. A large tube has been inserted over the hole, and up to the present time it has continued, although not as strong as at first, to emit a strong current of gas, of an inflammable nature, supposed to be hydrogen. He yesterday visited the spot, and saw the gas lighted. It burned freely, producing a bright flame and brightly impregnated with a sulphuric smell, but when burning or otherwise, not the least offensive."

Deaf Mute.—Never enter a sick room in a state of perspiration, as the moment you become cool your eyes absorb. Do not approach contagious diseases with an empty stomach; nor sit between the sick and the fire, because the heat attracts the thin vapor.

A Vicious Boy Now a Murderer.—The New York Sun says:—We have a short history of Abner Rogers, Jr; now about to be tried in Boston for murdering the keeper of the prison, from which we learn that, while a boy, his parents neglected his education, and permitted him to roam about with a number of idle boys who infested the town of Newbury, Mass. He commenced his career with idleness; next he left the school and despised the instruction it afforded; then he scoffed at the admonitions of those who tried to guide him in the path to future happiness and honor as a man and a citizen; he despised all their counsels, spent his time with lazy boys, like himself, who swore, smoked, chewed, drank rum congregated in squads and laughed at the wise boys of the village as they passed to school or to industrious employments. At the age of nineteen he was sent to prison for passing bad money; and from one step to another, he soon ascended the ladder of crime to where he now stands, on the topmost rung, about to step off on the gallows, there to end his career at the early age of thirty. This is only one among a thousand instances of the danger of commencing to do wrong. When a boy once begins, no matter how small the beginning may be, he steps into a railroad car on the top of a steep hill, down which he will run with fearful rapidity and be dashed into destruction in an abyss of crime below.

Jokes on Great Men.—The talented editor of the Springfield Republic, (Mr. Gallagher,) who was on the jury in the recent slave case, before the circuit court, relates the following amusing incidents of the trial:

"Ex-Governor Corwin did not make his appearance within the bar until toward the close of the argument on this cause. Soon after he entered, Ex-Senator Morris, while combating the prejudice against colored persons, remarked that a 'deep copper' was the original standard color." Every one in the room turned towards Corwin as a fair specimen of the standard, and the 'copper' colored critic bowed his acknowledgements to all!

One of the witnesses was asked to describe the clothing of one of the slaves. He was at a loss as to the color. "It was walnut died cloth," he said; "he did not know what to call the color, but it was just like the head of one of the lawyers; he had forgotten the name—oh, yes! it was the color of Mr. Hamer's hair! The laugh this time, was turned upon the walnut headed gentleman from Brown.

It wouldn't do probably to mention the thing publicly, but I will say to your readers, entre nous, that Judge McLean, recently married wife, is a amiable and accomplished lady, is a whole-hearted abolitionist, President of a Female Anti-Slavery Society, and warmly befriended all of that way."

The lawyers on the abolition side of the case appeared determined that the judge should not forget the views of his 'better half.' 'May it please the court,' said one of them, 'there are thousands of respectable men in Ohio, who regard this act of the defendant as a righteous act—aye, and ladies too, may it please your honor—ladies of distinction! The judge looked very grave. 'And, your honor,' said another one—the ladies have even taken the side of the poor slave, and organized societies for the promotion of the sentiments we are now advocating! The judge scratched his head. The laugh laid against the bench."

The Castle of Perote.—One of the Benar prisoners at Perote, in Mexico, in a letter to the Picayune, gives the following description of the celebrated Castle of Perote:—

"The Castle of Perote covers twenty-six acres of ground, and will accommodate ten thousand men. The outer row of apartments are seventy feet deep and thirty feet wide, with good brick or cement floors. The doors are thrown open at six o'clock in the morning and closed at the same hour in the evening. At night there is a free circulation of air, and a barrel of pure water is furnished to each room. The Texans, sixty-two in number, have three of the rooms for their accommodation. There is a square block of buildings inside of the one we occupy, which the governor and officers attached to the garrison have for their use. A large square inside of the last named building is beautifully paved and beautifully supplied with the best of water. We are allowed to go where we please inside of the outer wall during the day. Every room and the pavements are swept early each morning by Mexican prisoners. Coffee is furnished us twice a day, with plenty of good bread. Beans, rice, potatoes and beef are also given us; but beef of a good quality is not had in this part of the country."

Sarah Togue.—Mr. Chandler, of the United States Gazette, left his sanctum recently on a visit to Niagara Falls, &c. He never misses a good thing, and so he relates the following to his "Arm Chair."

"We stopped at Schenectady a short time, where there was a great disturbance among the passengers, who were separating for various routes. While I was standing solitary at a distance from the company, and gazing at the groups around me, I noticed a well dressed person leaving a small company that he had said something to, and coming directly toward me. When he had saluted me with much courtesy, he said—

"My dear sir, are you for Sarah Togue?"

We hesitated to give an answer, not recollecting the lady whose name he mentioned, and unwilling to answer all attention, provided she was worthy of special regard.

"Do you go for Sarah Togue?" said he. Now as I had a company near me, I did not like to make so open a confession; and as the gentleman seemed to be in a hurry, I remarked—

"I can't say that I go for Sarah Togue entirely, but I go in for Henry Clay, heart and hand."

"That's right," said he; "wharrah for Clay! but I must see who's for Sarah Togue," and in two minutes I heard the bell ring, and saw a car start off for Saratoga.

Important to Bachelors.—The London Dispatch, in reply to a correspondent, has the following grave advice to bachelors:

"A Bachelor (Brimingham) may address a lady as 'Madam,' if, however, he claim an acquaintance with her, he may employ the terms 'dear Madam,' and should there be a little bit of tender attachment. 'My very dear Madam' but in case of being in love, and an interchange of affection be evinced, something like the endearing term of 'dear girl' may be used. Always use 'dear girl' when the object addressed is over thirty, for at that age women like to be thought young. When a man is head over ears in love, and the woman he addresses in a similar predicament, the more extravagant the term used to convey his passion, the more will his suit be admired. Remember always address a woman over thirty as 'my dearest girl,' or 'charming girl.'"

Mortality at Sea.—The brig Aurora, arrived at Wilmington, N. C. last week from Cienfuegos, had five different Captains during her voyage. She cleared in March for the West Indies, but encountering a gale off Frying Pan, returned to port, when the captain then in charge left her. Another took his place, who died in a short time in the West Indies. Another and another still, successors, died, and she was brought into Wilmington in charge of the mate of a Boston vessel.

Dreadful Accident.—The Reading Democratic Press of Tuesday says:—We stop the press to record the occurrence of a dreadful accident on the Reading and Pottsville railroad this morning at three o'clock, about two miles above Reading. One train of cars laden with coal, and the other empty, came in collision, breaking and mashing into fragments one, and injuring another, killing two men and wounding five or six others who were on the train. The hands of the train coming down the road, escaped uninjured, by leaping, but the train from Reading being much lighter, was completely destroyed. We repaired to the dreadful scene at day break, and such a mass of ruins we never looked upon before. The hands were just taking out the mangled body of George Heckman, who was instantly killed, and shortly afterwards, the dead body of Daniel Fornwalt was drawn from the wreck.

Stripped Fornwalt, his father, had one of his legs broken, and injured otherwise, so that he is not likely to recover; Samuel Shultz had several ribs broken, and Conrad Fegan, Jr. was also badly wounded. Damage must be immense.

Double Murder near Toronto, U. C.—The Rochester Democrat gives the particulars of the murder of a gentleman named Kenner, residing near Toronto, by his servant McDermott. Hearing a noise at night, Mr. K. left his chamber to ascertain the cause, and was met and shot through the heart by McDermott, his house keeper having, it would seem, been previously strangled. After this double murder, the other two servants, McDermott and a maid servant, the only other inmates of the house, proceeded next morning, Sunday, to Toronto, with master's wagon and horse which they offered for sale—failing of which they embarked in a steamer for Lewiston. Meantime, a gentleman who was to dine with Mr. K. on Sunday, found the house deserted, and soon after the deed, notified the authorities of Toronto, who immediately despatched a steamer with officers to Lewiston, where the murderers were found in bed. They were re-conveyed to Toronto, examined and committed, the female having made confession.

A Good Retort.—An old woman seeing a sailor go by her door, and supposing him to be her son William, called out to him, "Billy, where is my cow gone?" The sailor replied in a contemptuous manner, "to the d—, for what I know." "Well, as you are going that way," said the old woman, "I wish you would let down the bars."

Not Bad.—May is considered an unfortunate month for marrying. A country editor says that a girl was asked not long since to unite herself in the silken tie to a brisk chap, who named May in his proposals. The lady hinted that May was an unlucky month for marrying. "Well, in June then," honestly replied the swain, who was anxious to accommodate. The damsel paused a moment, hesitated, cast down her eyes, and said with a blush, "wouldn't April do as well?"

Gone Crazy.—The editor of the Saint Louis Evening Gazette. Caused by suddenly coming into possession of three dollars at once!

A Hard Customer.—The Wetumpka Argus contains an offer of one thousand acres of land, made by Obadiah Langston, of Bibb county, Alabama, for the arrest of a man named Mark W. Doss, and his delivery into the custody of any keeper of a jail in Texas. Said Doss is represented as having deserted his wife, stolen a wagon and team in Alabama, gone over to Texas, where he turned to preaching as a Baptist minister, making great show of outward sanctity. He ingratiated himself into the good favor of a widow lady, and then stole her gold watch and decamped. He then reappeared in another part of Texas, represented his wife in Alabama to be dead, turned to preaching the gospel again, married a yellow woman, quarrelled with the brother of his first wife, and waylaid and shot him. He was thrown into jail, but broke out twice, and the last time made good his escape. He is now supposed to be in Tennessee or Mississippi, either secreted or preaching glad tidings, as before. The fellow sings well, and when a resident of Bibb county, Alabama, used to teach in singing schools. Editors are requested to pass him round, that, if in the United States, he may be rooted out and returned to Texas.

Power of Endurance.—A man lately stole a horse in New York, and locked him up in a stable, after which he ran away. The horse remained fourteen days in the stable without food or drink. With a little kind treatment he has entirely recovered, and is now doing well.

An Exchange no Robbery.—A friend of ours in attendance at the party given by Mr. Henshaw in Boston on the occasion of Mr. Tyler's visit, when about to leave was unable to find his hat.

"Was it a good one?" enquired the host. "Yes and new; purchased only last week."

"It's useless to look for it then, for the good hats have all been gone an hour," was the comforting response.—Hampden Post.

A Good one.—The following is now going the rounds, and we help it a foot or two on the journey.—An old clergyman, and rather an eccentric one withal, whose field of labor was a town in the interior of New England, one Sunday at the close of his services gave notice to the congregation that in the course of the week, he expected to go on a mission to the heathen. The members of the church were struck with alarm and sorrow at the sudden and unexpected announcement of the love of their beloved pastor, and one of the deacons, in great agitation, exclaimed—"Why my dear sir, you have never told us one word of this before! What shall we do?" "Oh brother C—," said the parson, with the greatest sang froid, "I don't expect to go out of town."

Letters from Rome state that the Pope is anxious to revive the ancient ceremony of solemnly crowning the greatest poet at the capitol, and that he has offered this distinguished honor to Chateaubriand. The Vicomte has declined the intended honor.

Marion and his men.—The Cheraw, (S. C.) Gazette relates the following anecdote:

An old lady, well known in the region of country between Georgetown and Marion court house related to a friend of ours a few days ago, a revolutionary anecdote, which we take pleasure in putting on record.

At the period to which we allude, the narrator was in the first blush of maidenly beauty, and resided with her mother near Port's Ferry, her father having previously been called hence to appear before his God. The British had possession of Georgetown, and were kept in constant alarm by the intrepid Swamp Fox and his brave and enterprising followers. Scouts from either of the contending parties were frequently seen near her mother's residence. Upon one occasion, one of Gen. Marion's agents left under her charge a quantity of provisions, and immediately after a party of the British called, searched the premises and discovered the hidden supplies. They charged upon her mother the fact of their being designed for the support of the rebel army. She prevaricated, and the officer in command insisted that she should have them hauled to the river and shipped to Charleston. The old lady said she would have them hauled as directed, but could not be responsible for them after they left her premises; that some of Marion's men were constantly scouting about there and would watch, and seize them as soon as they were removed. Taking advantage of this hint, the British acquiesced to carry off with them all they could bear away, and ordered her to have the remainder shipped immediately. With this intent, they proceeded to examine the supplies so as to secure the most serviceable and consequently the most valuable. The daughter, now four-score years of age, and still in possession of all her faculties, watched these proceedings with a restless and jealous eye; and was determined, if possible, to defeat their object. Retiring from the house for a few minutes, she hastily returned, and in apparent alarm and agitation, exclaimed—"Marion and his men are coming! A scout hovering on the edge of the neighboring thickets gave plausibility to the assertion. The British beat a hasty retreat, and before night-fall the provisions were removed by a patriotic band to a place of greater security, and freed from the prying curiosity of British emissaries.

More American Manufacture going abroad.—Troy and Canton.—One of our 'Canton merchants' made a purchase on Saturday of 50 dozen razor straps of the celebrated manufacture of our fellow citizen, Mr. Isaac Hillman, No. 188 Congress street, for the Canton market. The same gentleman carries out a large lot of American cutlery and American lead. He informs us that he found it extremely difficult when in Boston last week to obtain a supply of domestics by the 15th of August, the orders already received by the manufacturers being so full as to keep them constantly at work. There have already been exported from Boston to China, the present year, 15,000,000 yards of cotton goods, while from Great Britain to China, the export has been only 12,000,000 yards. The celestial give out cloths the preference.—Troy Whig.

ANECDOTES OF BONAPARTE AT ST. HELENA.

Mrs. Allen, who when a young girl resided with her brother at St. Helena, the cottage named "The Bricks," which Napoleon chose for his temporary residence while Longwood was preparing for him.

"The Emperor's habits during the time he stayed with us were very simple and regular. His usual hour for getting up was eight, and he seldom took any thing but a cup of coffee till 1 o'clock, when he breakfasted, or rather lunched; he dined at eight, and retired at about eleven to his room. His manner was so unaffectedly kind and amiable that I soon felt perfectly at ease in his society, and looked upon him more as a companion of my own age than as the mighty warrior at whose name the world grew pale. His spirits were very good, and he was at times almost malicious in his love of mirth and glee, not unmixed sometimes with a tinge of malice.

Shortly after his arrival, a little girl, Miss Legg, daughter of a friend, came to visit us at the Bricks. The poor child had heard such terrific stories of Bonaparte that when I told her he was coming up the lawn, she clung to me in an agony of terror. Forgetting my own former fears, I was cruel enough to rup and tell Napoleon of the child's fright, begging him to come into the house. He walked up to her and brushing up his hair with his hand, shook his head, making horrible faces, and giving a sort of savage growl. The little girl screamed so violently that mamma was afraid she would go into hysterics, and took her out of the room.

Napoleon laughed a good deal at the idea of his being such a lug fear and would not believe in the story of him. When I had told in the same terror of him. When I made this confession, he tried to frighten me as he had done Miss Legg, by brushing up his hair and directing his features, but he looked more grotesque and horrible, and I laughed at him. He then, as a last resource, tried the howl that was equally unsuccessful, and seemed I thought, a little provoked that he could not frighten me. He said the howl was Cossack, and it certainly was barbarous enough for any thing.

The following is her description of the personal appearance of Napoleon.

"His appearance on horseback was no less imposing. The animal he rode was a superb one; his color jet black; and as he proudly stepped up the avenue, arching his neck and clamping his bit, I thought him worthy to be the bearer of him who was once the ruler of nearly the whole European world!

"Napoleon's position on horseback, by adding height to his figure, supplied all that was wanting to make him the most majestic person I had ever seen. His dress was green, and covered with orders; and his saddle and housings crimson velvet, richly embroidered with gold. He neighed at our house, and we all moved to the entrance to receive him. Sir George Cockburn introduced us to him. On a near approach Napoleon, contrasting as his short figure did with the noble height and aristocratic bearing of Sir George Cockburn, lost something of the dignity which had so much struck me on first seeing him. He was dead pale, and I thought his features, though cool and impassive, and somewhat stern, were very beautiful. He seated himself on one of our cottage chairs, and after scanning our little apartment with his eagle glance, he complimented mamma on the pretty situation of the Bricks. When went to speak, his fascinating smile and kind manner removed every vestige of the fear with which I had regarded him. While he was talking to mamma, I had an opportunity of scrutinizing his features, which I did with the keenest interest; and certainly I have never seen any one with so remarkable and striking a physiognomy. The portraits of him gave a good general idea of his features; but his smile, and the expression of his eye, could not be transmitted to canvass, and these constituted Napoleon's chief arm. His hair was a dark brown, and as fine and silky as a child's; rather too much so indeed for a man as it caused it to look thin. His teeth were even, but rather dark, and I afterwards found that this arose from his constant habit of eating liquorice, of which he always kept a supply in his waistcoat pocket.

SPAIN.

The state of Spain is a riddle which seems every day to approach solution, yet is not solved. Attention is concentrated just now upon three points: the Regent, the capital, and the two Generals Zarbaud and Narvaez, who have been dodging each other somewhere about Saragossa.

The Regent was moving northward—what for, no one can tell: some say that he runs away to Cadiz; others that he is to strike some sudden blow; and others, that his whole plan, hitherto so inexplicable, will soon reach maturity and restore every thing. The insurgents, under General Aspruez, have occupied the heights near Madrid; and there they stop, too weak to attack, their opponents too weak to chase them away. The prisoners of Narvaez aver that he is ten or twelve thousand strong, and advancing; some where; his enemies, that he is only three or four thousand strong, or rather, so many weak, for his men are mutinous, and that he is retreating. And, mutatis mutandis, precisely the same things are said of Zarbaud. In a general view, the insurrection seems to have spread so as to envelope nearly all Spain, but not to have gained strength; so that its diffusion almost appears to entail weakness. On the other hand, the government forces are broken up in separate parts. Whether the revolution or the government will crumble to pieces first, from internal weakness, looks like a matter of chance. Mr. Guizot has denied French intervention in Spain, in terms so direct as to command defiance and faith. The one thing palpably certain is the frightful disorganization of Spain. Spain is incompetent to the functions of a nation; and the madness which racks it is so violent and lasting that people who do not adore the idol of 'the balance of power,' might almost wish that it were conquered, bound down, like a suicidal maniac, to have civilization forced upon it. —Spectator.

CHINA—By a wag.—A friend who has been off and on, an agent in China, and who has a shrewd turn for observation, with a lurking vein of satire in him, and who is moreover as thorough a snail as ever walked a deck, has sent us some curious notes about China. We annex some to day, beginning with 'Chinese contradictions.'

Our writings begin on the left and go on horizontally—their at the right, and run perpendicularly. Our pen is hard and held slantingly—their, the softest brush, and held perpendicularly. All their books begin just where ours ends, (on the last leaf.) Our alphabet is the leader in our language; they have none. We use metal types; they, only wood. In China you see old men flying kites; boys looking on with gravity. We shave our face and leave the hair on our head; they, the head, leaving the hair on the face. We say, 3d of the month of the year 1843; they say 1843, 4th mo. 31 day, &c. The points of the compass they reverse, beginning at the south, and say W. S. instead of S. W. &c. For mourning they wear white; and following a corpse to the burial, they run or walk very fast and make all sorts of noises. Instead of walking calmly and quiet as we do. The Chinese puts on his hat to be polite, and to receive guests with it is to be familiar. The left is the seat of honor. The Chinese wear no hats of fur, but put them on their bodies, and use silk for their heads; they wear their stockings over their trousers, tucking the latter inside. We drink tea with our meals, and with sugar and cream—they taking it without any thing else, and no cream and sugar. We have our shoes well blacked—the Chinese keeps the leather of his perfectly white.—We ring bells by striking the inner side—they outside. We look upon Christianity as the purifier of the heart, and affection; they consider it to be the corruptor of both. Peeling an orange, they turn the knife from them instead of towards them. Thatching a house, they begin at the top of the roof instead of the eaves. They carve their meat before they cook it. They hang their feather down instead of sticking it up. They drink their wines and their water warm. Priests stand in low estimation; and of lawyers, there are none. —N. Y. Amer.

INDIAN COUNCIL.—We learn from the Van Buren (Arkansas) Intelligencer, that the great Indian council at Tah-le-pah, in the Cherokee nation, closed its deliberations on the 3d instant. Delegates from the Cherokee, Creek, Chickasaw, Delaware, Shawnee, Piankashaw, Wea, Orange, Seneca, Stockbridge, Ottawa, Chippewa, Peoria, Winnebago, Potawatomi, and Saugeen tribes, were present. The result of their deliberations was a compact: To maintain peace and friendship among each other. To abstain from acts of personal violence. To provide for the improvement of their people in agriculture, manufactures, and other arts of peace. That no party shall, without the consent of the whole set, code, or in any manner, a senate to the United States any part of their present territory. To provide for the punishment of crimes committed by the citizens of one nation to citizenship in any other nation, party to the compact. To endeavor to suppress the use of ardent spirits within the limits of their respective nations; and to prohibit its introduction by the citizens of one nation into the territory of another.

A Queer Decision.—An assignee's notice in a North Carolina paper announces for sale among other things, "an interest in a negro man named Peters, it being one-third of one-eighth of said negro."

Mad Dogs.—A Peruvian.—An infallible preventive of spontaneous hydrophobia in dogs, will be found in flour of sulphur, a small particle of which should be mixed with their food or drink. It has been known in Europe for centuries, and is always used to prevent the dreadful disease from breaking out among the packs of hounds upon the estates of English noblemen.

Forty tons measurement of wooden clocks have been shipped on board of the packet ship Splendid, at New York for England.

More than a thousand slaves are said to have escaped from the island of Guadalupe to British Islands, in the confusion which followed the great earthquake on that island.

A gentleman residing near Darby, Delaware county, Pennsylvania, states that in his neighborhood the carcasses of a cow and a calf were taken from a tree about nine feet from the ground, where the animals had been lifted and lodged by the late freshet. A hog was taken alive from another tree.

POLITICAL ITEMS.

Tennessee has elected a Whig Governor by a majority of 4,204, and a Whig Legislature, both Senate and House, with a majority of eight on joint ballot. State Senators, 14 whigs to 11 locos. House of Representatives, 40 whigs to 35 locos.—Congressmen, 6 locos to 5 whigs.

North Carolina has elected 5 locos to 4 whigs to Congress.

Kentucky has elected 5 whigs and 5 locos to Congress.

Home Affections.—The heart has memories that cannot die. The rough rubs of the world cannot obliterate them. There is a magic in the very sound. There is the old tree under which the light-hearted boy swung in many a summer day, yonder the river in which he learned to swim; there the house in which he knew a parent's love, and found a parent's protection—now there is the room in which he romped with brother or with sister, long since, alas! laid in the yard in which he must soon be gathered, overshadowed by yon old church; whither with a joyous troop like myself he has often followed his parents to worship with, and hear the good old man who gave him to God in baptism. Why even the very school house, associated in youthful days with thoughts of ferule and tasks, now comes back to bring pleasant remembrances of many an attachment there formed; many an occasion that called forth some generous exhibition of the traits of human nature. There he learned to tell some of his best emotions. There, perchance, he first met the being who by her love and tenderness in after life has made a home for himself happier even than that which his childhood knew. There are certain feelings of humanity, and those too among the best, that can find an appropriate place for their exercise only by one's own fireside. There is sacredness in the privacy of that spot which it were a species of desecration to violate! He who seeks wantonly to invade it is neither more nor less than a villain; and hence there exists no surer tests of the debasement of morals in a community, than the disposition to tolerate in any mode the private life. In the turmoil of the world let there be at least one spot where the poor may find affection that is disinterested, where he may indulge a confidence that is not likely to be abused.

Important scientific discovery in Spain. We translate the following important article from a Madrid paper of the 14th June, in relation to a new discovery for propelling vessels:

"We inform the public that we have seen the model of a new invention for propelling ships, by Mr. Andres Iza, and which has been constructed by means furnished by our Institute here, for promoting mechanical inventions. The one alluded to is unquestionably highly important, from the immense locomotive power applied by hand, through the agency of an endless chain attached to the wheels of twenty and thirty feet diameter, according to the depth of water and height of the vessel; it is demonstrated that the power of one man thus applied, is equal to six horses in steamers; it is shown that four portable wheels can be easily applied to a ship of war of three or four hundred men, possessing thus a tremendous locomotive power by the principle in question; the same is applicable to the merchantmen without extraordinary hard work. A most glaring revolution in navigation has been attained by Mr. Iza, but he requires the support of the whole nation that his invention should not be usurped by foreigners, as has happened with steam power."

Cure for Foot Rot in Sheep.—I take the liberty of sending you the following very simple remedy for the Foot Rot in Sheep:

I had occasion to procure a Spanish Merino Buck, a few months ago, from a distant part of the country, and on going into my sheep yard soon afterwards, I found him very lame in two of his feet, so much so as scarcely to be able to walk. I immediately removed him to the barn floor, and on examination found that his lameness was occasioned by that scourge of the Ovine race—the foot rot. I cleared the hoofs thoroughly with soap suds, and fled to my books for a remedy. I soon found in the 'Complete Grazier,' page 165, several remedies for this disease; but as I had not at hand the ingredients of which they were composed, I had aside my books, and took down that 'cure all' among farmers, my bottle of spirits of turpentine, and with a feather applied it to the part affected, quite plentifully, twice or three times in the space of three days, keeping him upon the dry floor, when I found that a perfect cure had been effected, and put him with the flock again, and have seen nothing of the lameness since.

Now, Mr. Editors, this is a simple remedy, and found in every farmer's medicine chest, and I can safely vouch for its efficacy.—[Albany Cultivator.]

"Toss that are his over!"—The Georgia Courier tells a good 'un of Peter Francisco, who about fifteen years since applied to Congress for a pension for Revolutionary services. When in his prime he was supposed to be the strongest man in the United States. At the time of his application for a pension, says the Georgia Courier, a man had traveled all the way from Kentucky to Virginia, burning with a desire to have a half hour's talk with Peter. Our traveler was a half-breed, half-alligator man, and boasted that he could draw his weight in wild cats, and he'd no notion of having it. He said that Francisco was the strongest man in the United States; 'he'd no notion of having it.' He arrived in the neighborhood of his antagonist, a pleasant morning in spring, and inquired of a man whom he met in a narrow lane, where Peter Francisco lived, and was answered by the man, that he himself was Peter. The traveler mentioned his business, which, after a time, remains on the part of Peter, was finally consented to, and Peter dismounted from his horse for battle. WOOL GROWING IN ILLINOIS.

Sheep for Illinois.—Two thousand sheep passed through this village a few days since, on their way to the prairies of the west.

We clip the above from the "Allegany (New York) County Advocate." Flocks of sheep are continually arriving in our State. The wool tariff has given a stimulus to wool growers, that will soon enable the farmers of our country to grow wool enough for domestic use. Illinois furnishes advantages for raising sheep not found in any other State in the Union.—George Flower, a pioneer of this State, and an experienced wool grower—(who has for years foreseen the result of a system of public policy, which should protect the industry of this country, against the competition of other countries)—has thus set forth these advantages in his "Western Shepherd."—Sangano Journal.

"Wool has enriched every people that have grown it; and the nations that have established and protected the manufacture of wool, have increased in wealth and power, beyond all others. In 1331 the art of weaving woolen cloth was brought from Flanders into England, by John Kemp, to whom the King (Edward I.) granted his protection, and at the same time invited over Fullers and Dyers. The great and brilliant victories so conspicuous in the reign of the third Edward, achieved by an enormous sacrifice of human life, and waste of national treasure, and applauded by shouts of glory, were productive of trifling results compared with those which followed the introduction of the woolen manufacture by a small number of humble Flemings. This 'single art,' wisely fostered by the government, has carried Great Britain to the highest pitch of wealth and power. The woolen fabrics are the great staples of her commerce, which she exchanges to such great advantage, for the raw material of other countries. By the perfection and extent of this art alone, she places all nations under tribute. The French have acquired great wealth by the growth and manufacture of wool. Genoa and Venice were long enriched by its manufacture. The expenses of the Royal family of Spain were long sustained by the revenue afforded by their fine woolen cloths. Shall this certain and almost universal source of wealth be longer neglected by us?—What are our capacities for the growth of wool? What is our situation for its manufacture? The peculiar wealth of Illinois is found in her prairie lands—full fifteen millions of acres, is already cleared of timber and covered with rich and succulent grass. Every acre of this land would, if timbered, cost at least ten dollars to clear it. This grand expense which, in timbered States, must be purchased at the cost of one hundred and fifty millions of dollars worth of labor, is with us, by nature prepared for tillage, and clothed with grass, inviting flocks and herds. A great portion of these prairies are dry and undulating; well suited for Sheep. On the Eastern and Western side of the State the prairies are smaller than in the center. Even in those great expanses, far from timber, wool is almost the only article that could be immediately and profitably raised. Eastern men have large investments in this land. Let them add a little more to it, and place a good flock thereon. It would give it value.

"Our climate is genial to sheep. The quantity of land now yielding summer pasture, and easily made ready for winter pasture, is greater than in any other State. Corn, hay and oats may be purchased lower than elsewhere, and grown in abundance; and after a twenty year's test, a pure blooded flock of fine quality exists, from which to propagate the race. These are our capabilities for its growth. The drawback, as I have said, is the wolf. He ought to be killed by the State. I half the depredations and losses, occasioned by the wolf, were perpetrated by wolves in human form, our indignation would be aroused, the country would arise and exterminate them. I am afraid it is not constitutional for the people in their legislative capacities, to kill wolves. All powers not surrendered by the people, remain with them: (so runs the logic.) There is no express provision in our Constitution to kill wolves: hence the Legislature must not law against wolves. Then we have the large black wolf, and the little prairie wolf. The political sagas may decide that it may be constitutional to kill one and not the other. 'Tis a vexation. I'll quit it, and add a huntsman and a pack of hounds to the prairie flocks, and that will make all safe.

The geographical position of Illinois is most favorable for the establishment of manufactures. Every day we hear an increasing complaint that the west is getting too far from the east. Now! notwithstanding the improved modes of conveyance, detrimental delays occur in getting goods from the east to the west. The canal communications from N. York and Philadelphia are frozen until the middle of April, and the goods destined for the Spring sales in the west, cannot arrive until midsummer. If manufactures were here, this inconvenience would be avoided, and an increasing market would be found in the States that are springing up, yet further from the east than we are. The State owns great water powers on Rock river, Illinois river, and at the Rapids of the Great Wabash, besides others upon streams of secondary size. Would it not be a wise policy to perfect these powers, and lease them out on easy terms, to invite the establishment of woolen manufactures? A living may be got by agriculture, but no nation can be wealthy that always purchases the manufactured article and exports the raw material. So long as this injudicious policy continues, with regret I see that my farm in Illinois pays annually a greater tax to Great Britain than to the U. States. From the establishment of the woolen manufacture, done, an increasing stream of prosperity would flow for many generations. Illinois would then stand pre-eminent for industry and wealth amongst her sister States, as Britain now does amongst the nations of the world. But we must first grow the raw material. As a State and a Nation, we are in the infancy of our existence; and have but taken the first step in the long avenue of time. The savages tribes have passed away. The hunters and the shepherds will soon overspread the verdant plains. Their independent life, equally removed from the luxury of wealth, and the dependence of want, must in its turn, give place to a denser population and a more laborious people, the tillers of the soil. Individual wealth and national power will then attain its height.—The ranks of men will divide, the rich from the poor. Power and poverty will walk in their accustomed paths of violence and deception. The numbers of the human race will decrease, the fertility of the earth will diminish, until the few remaining hordes, savage and debased from destitution, lead a vagrant life over sand and barren rocks, on the very spot now teeming with the luxuriance of vegetable life. Earth will leave no trace, and time, no record of the past. The mighty change, though distant many ages, is now in progress. Every shower that falls, leaping each rut and gully, sweeps a portion of the fertile earth through creeks and rivers to the Ocean, there to be modeled upon the vast foundation now preparing by the little insects building up the coral rock now emerging in the great South Sea.

Happy the era of our present existence, the opening of the new pastoral age—a life envied and renowned—chronicled in all history, and sung by the poets of every age.

"Thrice happy life that's from ambition free, Removed from Crowns and Courts how cheerfully! A quiet contented mortal spends his time, In hearty health, his soul untroubled by crime."—Romeo's Gentle Shepherd.

New Cotillion.—An exchange paper gives the following as the figure of a new cotillion. First couple forward, wheel and fire—second couple ditto—almost a he corners—nose—your nose—gentlemen cross hands, ladies kiss over—right and wrong—pussy—lemonade all—first couple center round the whole possible—second ditto—third ditto—fourth ditto—bob your cocoanuts, and then go to roost.

THE CONSUMPTIVE'S PLAIN.

BY D. RUSSELL.

I gaze upon each lovely scene.
And think how near the time must be,
How few brief hours may intervene
Before I reach—Ereity!
This solemn thought my soul pervades,
Wherefore my weary footsteps move;
I know that soon Death's darkling shades
Before my glowing eyes shall move,
And all earth's beauties fade away
Upon that last, that trying day.
Each graceful tree—the beautiful flowers
I view with softened, sad delight,
My mind reverts back to the hours
Of glorious youth, when I was bright.
When glowing visions beamed around
My path, where I see, the summer's lust
This shrine, unclouded, still to guide;
Bright as the record of the past—
Bright as shall be their aure reward,
This lovely beam hath ever shone
And o'er my path its radiance thrown.
Soon must I bid adieu to all,
Howe'er bright, howe'er dear;
I think I hear a far-off call—
"Prepare to come, the end is near!"
O! 'tis a heavenly voice, which speaks,
Of peace and pardon thro' His blood,
To the lost soul which humbly seeks
To do His will, most holy God!
'Tis the Redeemer's peaceful voice—
In His blood name will I rejoice.
I mourn not, though the end is near,
"I know in whom I have believed,"
His promise is most sure, and clear
The sacred truths I have received.
My spirit longs to soar above,
Free from this world of sin and woe,
There to enjoy that boundless love
Which I have learned to prize below;
With my last breath will I proclaim
His matchless love, His glorious name.

EDUCATION.

"Education is the cheap defence of nations," was the profound aphorism of a British statesman; a man who was in learning, vivid, varied, and philosophic, and who threw out more gems in conversation, sparkling and brilliant as they came, than any other man of his day. A maxim of more truth than force, we do not remember ever to have seen. And if we consult the history of ancient republics, we will find that education is not only the chief, but the chief defence of nations. The Roman empire bears a powerful, a melancholy attestation of this fact. So long as she pursued the advantages of education; so long as she paid attention to the instruction of her youth, and encouraged the pursuit of literature among her people, she prospered. But in an hour her literary institutions were subverted, and with the fall of the illustrious Cicero, perished the hope of her most sanguine citizens, and her political existence fast ebbed to a close. Greece, too, is an other witness to this fact. Once she was the nursery of science and the arts; the patroness of literature; and at the same time commanded the respect and admiration of the world, but where is she now? The fatal hour came when her institutions of learning, which were the pride of her people, and the evidence of her greatness and glory, were trampled down by the desolating ravages of ignorance, and the vaulting ambition of tyrants and demagogues. When these were swept from the soil, the sun of her glory faded away, and she was soon prostrate in the dust. Search the records of the past, and there is not to be found in the history of any country, so much bravery as was displayed by this once powerful, but now degenerate nation. Where, in the annals of history, can we find such men as Leonidas and his compeers in arms? Where can we find in any country, places so distinguished for nobility, daring and heroic bravery as Marathon and Plataea? In her fallen state we see verified the fact, that valor and undoubted bravery cannot secure to any nation the permanency of its institutions, and that so long as education is properly attended to a nation will prosper. And as often as we are pointed to the history of these ancient republics, as teaching us a lesson of momentous importance, we can it over as silly children do their tasks, without any impression of its vast importance. Our fathers knew how to appreciate this sentiment. They knew that intelligence was the life, the very spirit of liberty. They taught their sons, and their sons' sons after them, were taught, to know it and act upon it. The results of their foresight and their wisdom, is to be seen every where. Here we have a land, of every land the pride, smiling before us and around us. From the capes of the Chesapeake to the far off springs of the Missouri, the blessings and benefits of education are felt, invigorating and purifying the whole moral and political atmosphere; all are taught that will be; and he that profits most by the advantages thus afforded, is ever the firmest friend and most faithful defender of the laws, liberties, and institutions of his country.

We may visit the mausoleums of the ancient kings; we may go into the sepulchres of the famed nations of the earth; we may go to the grand tombs of mighty men, or to the lowly graves of those who welcomed death, and a soft voice from their ashes will whisper in our ears the truth of this aphorism. We may traverse the globe from east to west; we may journey on from pole to pole; from where dwells the lone Greenlander to the habitation of the savage Hottentot, and we will find that wherever the people have received the benefits of education, "Liberty has disclosed her nature and genuine principles, and secured to her a firm, against despotism on one hand, and popular licentiousness on the other."

War may stride over our land with the mighty step of a giant, crushing thousands of noble and patriotic spirits; and the widow and the orphan may fall victims to the ruthless hand of a savage enemy; pestilence may steal over like an invincible curse; reaching its victims silently and unseen; unpropitiously here a village and there a city, until it has made every dwelling a sepulchre; famine may brood over it with a long and dreary visitation until the diabolical destroyer has made the sky itself brazen, and the beautiful greenness to give place to the parched desert; causing the whole country to become a wild waste of fearful, unproductive desolation, and the flowers will again bloom in peace on the battle-field above the crushed skeletons; the destroying angel of pestilence will return, when the errand is done, and the nation will lyrate freely again; the barrenness of famine will cease to last, and the sterile land will be fruitful as ever; the cloud will be prodigal of its hundred watery treasure, and the wilderness will blossom as the rose; but if the moral and intellectual improvement of the mind be neglected; if education, from which flows such delicious and enduring benefits to mankind, be abandoned, our people and their representatives will bow in unconditional obsequiousness to individual and tyrannical dictation. Then, and not till then, can impudence, intrigue, corruption triumph over honesty, virtue, and intelligence. Then will our liberties depart for ever. Of these there can be no resurrection. The mighty fabric of our glory will then totter into ruins, and the nations of the earth will mock at us in our overthrow. If the time shall ever come when other nations will point at our country the finger of scorn, and with a supercilious sneer exclaim, "There lies upon a sepulchre, the carrion of nations!" it will be when our people shall forsake their institutions of learning. God grant that that time may be far, far distant in the future.

As our government rests solely on the virtue and intelligence of the people, how important is it that the minds of the rising generation should be rightly cultivated! Let those in authority kindle and cherish the vestal flame of knowledge among the people, and they will secure to our government a permanency which all the corruption of designing and heartless demagogues can never shake. The consciousness that they have thus served their country, will be far better than to have their names engraven on pillars of marble, or proclaimed by the ephemeral blast of fame's obstreperous trumpet!

AFFAIRS IN GREAT BRITAIN.
London, Aug. 2, 1843.
No casual observer, passing through the streets of this great city, and seeing the millions entirely immersed, apparently, in business or pleasure; in making money, or in spending it; would ever dream of the terrible elements of destruction fermenting beneath this gay surface. And yet many of the best informed predict that in a few years all the horrors of the French Revolution will be here repeated. That many-headed monster, the people, is fierce with long-borne oppression and infuriated, and when they once rise in their might, overpowering, but irrational, humanity must shudder at the consequences.

Every thing in nature tends to an average; the mountains and valleys are approaching the same level. This progress in civil affairs has not yet arrived, but come it will. The contrast between the poor and the rich is too violent to be permanent. One nobleman has estates upon which you may drive in a straight line for thirty miles; and at the sale of the property of the late Duke of Sussex, his plate sold for 100,000 dollars; his trinkets for 10,000; and his snuff boxes and watches, each for as much more. Now look at the other side. A clergyman, seventy years old, was last week sent to prison for a month's rent of 50 shillings, and in his pleading for more time, he said, "I have been living for months past, with my wife and two daughters, on potatoes and bread. They have no bed to lie on, no chair to sit on, and God help me, only some old matting to cover them at night. I am poor, miserably poor!"

The Times of the same day announces the Queen's intention of giving a magnificent series of balls. Her majesty has also lately made a royal visit to the Italian Opera, where no distress could be seen in the glare of the chandeliers, nor groans heard in the shouts of loyalty from the 'full-dressed' thousands filling the five tiers of gold and crimson boxes and the brilliant parterre. She has also visited the Thames Tunnel, (narrowly escaping being run down by a steamer,) the Royal Academy of Arts, the new Houses of Parliament, &c. &c. No wonder that a poor woman, who yesterday was passing the palace near me, indignantly exclaimed, "where she goes in all her finery, and many and many's the day I've worked for a penny and two pence the hour, and glad to do it; and I have to give her half of it!"

Similar feelings are very general. In the late of Wight I was told by a hotel keeper, that for every pair of horses let out, the Queen took an excise duty of five shillings. A householder in the same lovely place, said that his rent was 20l, but taxes 9l more. How would Americans bear a tax of nearly 50 per cent? A violent radical, whom I lately found, in the person of a seller of old books, said that he prayed daily that America might never get the curse of primogeniture. He exclaimed—"we Britons are slaves. We are still vassals under the Norman Conquest. The Norman nobles rule us Saxons, and place their feet on our necks. They have only changed the feudal tenure to the tenure of rent. We are worse off than American slaves, for when we get sick, our masters turn us off to starve, or send us to the work house, where we are kept on seventeen pence per week. Sir, there will be a revolution, but it will be a Helot war of extermination!"

It is painful to record these things, but I fear they are too true. No begging in the streets is allowed by policemen, but the poor creatures beseeching looks are expressive enough, as they stand by a window where peaches are for sale at a dollar each and nine apples for eight dollars each one. Nine hundreds are daily added to the starving population by the stoppage of the iron works, &c. What will be the end no one can tell. We may hope for the best, but must fear the worst.

Your regular correspondent will of course send you the usual items of news. A painful one is the loss of the steamer Pegasus with forty human lives. On her voyage from Leit to Hull, she ran on a sunken rock, stove a hole in her bow, but was backed off, filled and sunk. Had she remained quietly on the rock, all might have been saved.

The late duel between Col. Fawcett and Lieutenant Munro, in which the former fell, continues to occupy a large share of public attention.

The revolution in Spain seems to have ended in the bloodless fall of the Regent. The next courier may however announce a new revolution. Spanish bonds rise and fall like the barometer.

In Parliament Lord John Russell and Lord Palmerston have made fierce attacks on the ministry of Sir Robert Peel, who answered them very lamely. He will probably be forced to resign. He complained much that the American Tariff prevented English manufactured rubbish being shipped off to ruin our trade when a glut occurs here. The Irish Arms Bill is opposed as such a tyrannical measure deserves.

Mr. Hume, perhaps the most liberal minded, honest and republican member in the House, was refused by the ministers leave to bring in a bill for the establishment of schools to promote a sound education for the rising generation of the United Kingdom, at the public expense, without sectarian bias, to the end that general instruction and a spirit of christian brotherhood and good will may be disseminated among all classes. In his speech he stated that of 55,000 criminals, 23,000 could neither read nor write, and only 2,300 could read and write well. In Birmingham, of 46,000, about 22,000 received no education whatever. He highly eulogized our American example.

Mr. Hume is distinguished for his enlightened zeal in behalf of the people. To his unflinching exertions is due the opening of the Galleries, Abbeys, Museums, etc. to the people, to whom they belong; and the appreciation of them by their crowds and good order, has justified his pledges in their behalf. I am glad to know that his high and peculiar merits are well known among us, and were he an American he would now be found high in office.

The Repeal riots in Wales continue to increase, and set at defiance the Magistrates. At the toll gates, which it is their aim to destroy, a toll of 6l is levied from the poor farmer on 6l worth of lime, for manure! The conspirators are perfectly organized, surprise, in the famous Spanish Guerillas, and seem to arouse all the old Welsh spirit, and in their mountain fortresses are found the old Britons, driven thither by the Romans, Saxons and Normans.

The Repeal agitation is daily spreading in Ireland, but no decisive steps have been taken. I proceed thither immediately, to pass several weeks, and will endeavor, by personal observation, to form a correct opinion, and will probably communicate to you the result.
W. M. G.

PROGRESS OF THE REPEAL AGITATION.

The Repeal demonstration at Waterford yesterday week was, it is reported, attended by upwards of three hundred thousand people, many of whom resided upwards of thirty miles from the spot. The meeting was held at Ballybricken, where a platform, capable of containing three thousand persons, was erected. The Mayor of Waterford was present. Sir R. Musgrave, Bart., was called to the chair. After several resolutions, had been proposed and seconded, Mr. O'Connell addressed the meeting at great length. The first part of his speech was made up of the usual topics, abuse of The Times and the Ministry, and expressions of his determination to carry Repeal as the one thing necessary for restoring prosperity to Ireland. He then proceeded to animadvert at great length on the letter of Mr. Villiers Stuart, the member for Waterford, on the subject of Repeal movement, and to show that Mr. Stuart was unfit any longer to represent them.

The banquet in the evening was attended by about 450 guests, as many as the room was capable of accommodating.

Mr. O'Connell, after expressing his delight at the presence of Sir Richard Musgrave, said what he had witnessed that day made him hope that the time was not far distant when he would enjoy the cooperation of such a noble ally. He then counties he had the millions with him; but in Waterford he had not only the millions, but all that was high in character and powerful in influence of the landed gentry. Give him every county like Waterford, and sixty of tenure would be accomplished, and the present horrid system of reciprocal murder between landlord and tenant would be abolished for ever. Why should not Waterford be foremost in the struggle for national glory? Waterford had always been foremost. Clare had acted nobly: the men of Tipperary were as brave as their own swords, if they had them: those of Kilkenny, as pure as the limpid streams that flowed through her verdant plains; but it was in Waterford that, in 1820, began the struggle for liberty, by crushing the power of the Beresfords; and Waterford, in 1843, would be the first to contribute its gentry to support and cherish the cause of freedom. They were certain of Repeal. The Government were first thought to frighten us by threats of civil war, because the people presumed in the exercise of the subject's undoubted right to petition for the repeal of an act for Parliament for the redress of grievances. He thanked heaven that he hurled the lofty tones of utter defiance at them. The day-star of liberty was about to arise in the horizon, and, as long as the people pursued the constitutional path in which they were now progressing, they might scoff at the menaces of Peel.

The weekly meeting of the National Repeal Association was held on Tuesday last, in the Corn Exchange Dublin.

Sums of money, the contributions to the repeal rent, were handed in from various places, and several new members were proposed and admitted.

Mr. O'Connell gave notice that, in consequence of the dismissal of the repeal magistrates by the Government, he would move, on the following Tuesday, that, in pursuance of the practice adopted by the Catholic Association, they would take measures for the appointment, in each district in Ireland, of arbitrators, to whom the people would refer all their differences, instead of going, as heretofore, to hostile petty sessions, courts, and paying fees to magistrates' clerks. The association would have legal instruments prepared, authorizing the persons appointed to act as arbitrators. (Loud and prolonged cheering.)

It was announced that the repeal rent for the week amounted to £1,680. 5s. 9 1-4d.

An extraordinary meeting of the Association was held on Friday last. Mr. O'Connell addressed a very long speech to the assembly. He said he had called them together that day because of the result of the recent debate on Ireland, the entire tenor of which showed that every person who took part in it considered the Repeal of the Union a settled question. They had only to go on as they had commenced, and they would certainly have Repeal. He considered that the thing was done. Mr. O'Connell proceeded to speak of the Irish nation as morally and socially superior to any other nation on the face of the earth; and, after proceeding, at some length, to show that neither Whigs nor Tories would do anything effectual for the benefit of Ireland, he again showed the exceeding great prosperity, advantages, wealth, and happiness that would result from Repeal. He (Mr. O'Connell) concluded by proposing a string of resolutions, expressive of what may be called his course of policy. He invited the co-operation of the landlords, warning them against non-compliance, as the wish of his party is to do justice to all. The last resolutions set forth, that an act would be passed by the new parliament, preventing English companies from holding land as in Ulster, the land in which latter place would be sold, and the money paid the English holders.

Mr. Bladen, one of the oldest Tory magistrates in the county Clare, and formerly the intimate friend of Sir Robert Peel, has been dismissed for becoming a member of the Repeal Association. Mr. Duckett, (of Waterford,) Mr. Daly, (of the county Westmeath,) Mr. Andrew Joyce, (of Galway,) and Mr. Sherlock have, for the same cause, been also dismissed from the commission of the peace within the last week; and these gentlemen, with all who have gone before them in the same way, have, from feelings of wounded pride and a spirit of opposition, become active agitators in beating up for repeal recruits in the higher ranks of society.

FATHER MATHEW IN LIVERPOOL.

The concluding meeting of the week held by the Total Abstinence Society, at the Liver Theatre, on the evening of Saturday last, was decently crowded in every part, with the exception of the boxes, in consequence of it having been publicly advertised and confidently rumored, during the day, that the Rev. T. Mathew would be present. The rumour turned out to have been well-founded; for the reverend gentleman, who had arrived by the three o'clock p.m. train, and who, immediately after, proceeded to Brown's Temperance Hotel, Clayton-square, where he will remain during his stay, entered the theatre about half-past seven o'clock, accompanied by the Rev. Mr. Parker, of St. Patrick's, Lawrence Heyworth, Esq., and other gentlemen. His appearance on the stage was hailed with loud and prolonged cheering from all parts of the house, a compliment which he frequently acknowledged. When silence had, in some degree, been restored, the chair was taken by Mr. Heyworth, who opened the proceedings with a brief, but appropriate address, in the course of which he very warmly eulogized Mr. Mathew for his successful exertions in the cause.

The first speaker was Mrs. Jackson, of Whitehaven, who continued for nearly an hour to advocate the principles of total abstinence, and to impress upon the female portion of the audience the necessity of discountenancing the use of all intoxicating liquors in their families and among their acquaintances.

The Rev. T. Mathew then addressed the audience, and spoke for about forty minutes, notwithstanding that he labored under a very severe cold and hoarseness, brought on by his open-air exertions in the manufacturing districts during the week. He said his heart had been cheered by the announcements he had heard of the great spread of teetotalism in Liverpool, as evinced by the numbers already connected with the society and the immense decrease in the consumption of wine; and he went on to describe his progress at Leeds and York, where, he observed, he had had the felicity to see the most respectable portions of the community joined in the maintenance of the great cause. The change which had taken place in Ireland, he said, was wonderful. Vice and crime had almost entirely disappeared; rioting and factious lights were no longer heard of; the bridewells and gaols were nearly empty; the Smithfield Penitentiary, which was the largest prison in Dublin, had been closed; and peace, happiness, and eternal charity were smiling over the land, because more than three-fourths of the whole population, or about five millions in number, had taken the total abstinence pledge; and not one in five hundred had been found base enough to violate his solemn engagement. As another proof of the effects produced by the temperance system in Ireland, he stated, that no fewer than thirty thousand communicants had approached the table of the Lord, at the Catholic Cathedral at Cork, on last Easter Monday morning; and he would upon an interesting address by an assurance that the society was free from all sectarianism, either in politics or in religion; that men of all parties could join it without sacrificing one iota of principle; and that he himself blessed the day, when he was prevailed upon, by some benevolent individuals in Cork, to become one of its members.

Mr. Fear, of Preston, then proceeded to give an animated account of Mr. Mathew's gratifying reception in the manufacturing districts, and said that 2,000 had taken the pledge at York, 4,000 at Leeds, 7,000 at Bradford, and amongst others, the landlady of a public house and her daughter at Huddersfield.

After a vote of thanks had been passed to Mr. Mathew, the reverend gentleman administered the pledge to about thirty males and females on the platform and in the body of the house, and the proceedings terminated.

The Rev. T. Mathew preached two sermons at St. Patrick's chapel, Toxteth-park, yesterday, in aid of the funds of the school attached thereto. The building was densely crowded on both occasions. The gallery at the morning sermon was occupied by several highly respectable families, Protestants as well as Roman Catholics; and, amongst others with whose names we were acquainted, we noticed Edward Rushton, Esq. (our excellent stipendiary magistrate,) W. Ratkburn, Esq., and R. V. Yates, Esq.

The portion of scripture from which the text was taken in the morning consisted of the whole of that in which Christ is described by St. Mark, in his sixth chapter, as having fed the multitude with five loaves and two fishes. The reverend gentleman, who spoke with great eloquence, and occasionally with much rapidity, enlarged upon the christian grace of charity, and the urgent necessity which exists at the present time for imparting a moral and religious education to the youths of the country; and concluded with an affectionate appeal in favor of the schools.

He administered the pledge during the day to large numbers of persons, upon the vacant ground contiguous to the Chapel. Aldon.

A Counterpart to Tight-Lacing.—The means taken to effect the alteration of the women's feet in China are decidedly prejudicial to the health, and frequently attended with fatal consequences. This fact was ascertained by a clever young naval surgeon, who was for some time stationed at Chusan. It happened that during an excursion into the country, one day entered a house, where he found a child, about eight years old, very ill, and suffering under severe hectic fever. On examination he discovered that her feet were undergoing the process of distortion. He was informed that she had been a year under this treatment. Moved by pity for the little sufferer, he proceeded to remove the bindings, and fomented the feet, which were covered with ulcers and inflammation. The change in shape had already commenced by the depression of the toes. The child was much relieved by, and evidently grateful for, his treatment. On taking his leave, he warned the mother that she would certainly lose her child if the bands were replaced; but his remonstrances were of no avail. Whenever he returned, and this happened frequently, he always found them on again; the woman urging as an excuse, that her daughter had better die than remain unmarried, and that, without improved feet, such a calamity would be her inevitable lot. As might be expected, the child grew worse and worse. After a longer interval than usual, he once again revisited the house, but found it untenanted and a little coffin lying at the door, in which he discovered the body of his poor young patient.—Lock's Campaign in China.

A Petrified Human Head.—An interesting geological discovery has recently been brought to light, namely, a petrified human head, which shelled out of the Lincoln stone-brash bed, which comprises from No. 2 to No. 10 of the uppermost layers of rock beneath the alluvial soil. The layers of rock thus denominated are those used for the formation of lime, and the petrified head was discovered and laid aside by one of the laborers of the quarry as he was engaged in breaking up stones for the kiln. The petrification comprises the whole of the head with the common rock, and been rendered incapable of shelling. Beneath, there is, in a perfect state, the cavity for the vertebrae of the neck, &c. The identity with the human head is beyond a doubt. The petrification is at present in the possession of Mr. Skill, mason, in the Bail, Lincoln.—Stamford Mercury.

The Bonaparte Family.—The Count de Surville (Joseph Bonaparte) and M. Leve-Ramolino have come to an amicable settlement of the suit, which had been instituted by Madame Letitia Bonaparte, to obtain a revocation of the legacy left by the will of Napoleon to his uncle, M. Ramolino. The Count de Surville felt that, as the donation was express, it ought to be respected. At the same time, M. Ramolino, conceiving that the house in which the Emperor was born ought never become the property of a private person, has given it up to the head of the Bonaparte family, that he may dispose of it according to the wishes of the people of Corsica.

ARRIVAL OF THE GREAT WESTERN.

The Great Western passed up to her dock at half past six o'clock yesterday morning.

She left Liverpool at 6 P. M. of the 5th instant. A strong westerly wind was blowing at the time of her departure, which continued during the whole voyage, at times increasing to a gale. Her trip was made with yards down and top-masts struck.

She passed Sandy Hook at 4 o'clock this morning, and at 5 o'clock at the Quarantine Ground. Duration of passage—fifteen and a half days.

She brought one hundred and twenty-one passengers.

We have full files of London and Liverpool papers to her day of sailing inclusive. We are indebted for a copy of the London Times of the 5th, to the enterprise of Charles Wilmer, Esq., who ran a special express from London to Liverpool, (212 miles,) to enable him to despatch by the Great Western the papers published at London on the morning of her day of sailing.

Nothing of interest had transpired since the departure of the Ibernia.

The packet ship Virginia, Montezuma, and Hottinger had arrived at Liverpool; the Montezuma having made the trip in fifteen days. Her top-gallant sails, says the European Times, were never lowered again her departure until her arrival—and during the whole of that time her mainmast had only been furled for the space of three hours.

The weather in England has become more favorable. Days had experienced an unusual amount of sun, and a few showers of rain and a few drizzles were however experienced.

For August 1st, it is said, present a prediction to the Queen, claiming to be uttered by the late of his father—the late Duke of Sussex [Standard].

In the Court of Bankruptcy, an application was made by a gentleman on the part of the Governor and State of Illinois, to participate in the dividend now in the course of payment out of the estate in the sum of $1,750,000 as due on a count of bonds which the bankrupts held at the time of their failure. This was opposed by the assignees on the ground that some part of the debt was bad—the bonds having been at the time they obtained them in the state of insolvency, and unable to pay its own dividend. The application was granted. [London Herald, July 31.]

House of Commons, August 4.—The House having resolved itself into committee of supply, Sir G. Clerk moved a vote of £1,281,000 for compensation to the owners of the opium delivered up at Canton. This sum it was proposed to give to them in addition to the six millions of dollars paid and payable from China; and the total would, he believed, be a fair compensation. [Standard, 74 to 27.]

Sir J. Graham said the committee of supply would be moved first on Monday, after which he would propose to read the Irish Army Bill a third time; and if there should be time after that, he would propose to proceed with the Scotch Church Benefices Bill.

IRELAND.—The Lords of the Treasury had issued a minute, which had been received at Dublin, and a copy forwarded to every person holding office under Government, threatening with immediate dismissal every individual who connects himself in any way, however remote, with the agitation for the repeal of the Union. Repealers will regard this as a mere brutum fulmen, and laugh at it accordingly. [European Times.]

SPAIN.—Seville continued to be bombarded on the 25th ult., showing great resistance, but suffering great disasters. Saragossa had sent in its adhesion to the government at Madrid. The Junta of Burgos had arrested General Seoane, on his passage through that place. Madrid continued tranquil. [ib.]

Should Espartero be still unsuccessful in his attack when the opposing forces come up, his position will be exceedingly critical. Three brigades under Roncali, Masaredo, and Campuzano, had been sent from Madrid, with directions to place themselves under Concha's orders. The forces thus united would be far superior to the Regent's army, and a retreat on Cadiz would most probably occur to him as advisable. But all issue by that port is now almost impossible, as the Vervion brig of war and two other vessels, sent by the authority of Cadiz against the naval force of the insurgents, had quitted their own party, and gone over to the enemy. Cadiz is now therefore blockaded by a frigate, three steamers, a brig of war and several smaller crafts. It may however be doubted whether the victorious party would be very anxious to oppose the Regent's departure from the kingdom by Cadiz, for his capture would only cause them embarrassment.

Barcelona Journals have been received to the 29th. The Junta persisted in its opposition to the Moderado party. Arrests and domiciliary visits were taking place. Cortinez was remaining at Cervera with his staff, seeing that he could do nothing against the determination of the Junta.

Valencia journals of the 26th state that the intelligence of the victory at Madrid had been received the previous day. It was greeted with extraordinary marks of satisfaction, and the town was illuminated in the evening. The Junta had published a proclamation forbidding goods to be received without payment of the ordinary duty. [London Morning Chronicle, August 5th.]

Madrid, July 27.—The principal novelty to-day is the cessation of the state of siege, which is declared at an end by a decree in to-day's Gazette.

The Jews in Russia—Gumbinnen, July 29th.—There seems to be no doubt that the Imperial Ukas will shortly be carried into execution, by which all the Jews in Russia and Poland are to remove to the distance of 50 wersts from the frontiers; those who have no fixed settlement immediately, and those who have such a settlement, within two years. It is said that the Communes on the other side of the frontier are to be made jointly responsible for the pains and penalties which individuals belonging to them may incur by defrauding the Customs, which measure, it is supposed, will tend to counteract smuggling. [Hamburg Papers, August 1st.]

HOW STANDS IRISH REPEAL.

It is manifested from the tenor of the foreign news by the Hibernian and Great Western, that Ireland continues in a state of almost revolutionary agitation.

O'Connell is still the Storm King. He is not only raising the tempest, but from the confident manner of all his speeches he evinces a perfect confidence that he can control the storm as he pleases. It is gratifying to add that it seems his rigid determination to obtain the establishment of an Irish Parliament, peaceably and according to law. In this respect he shows a clear head, infinitely above the sagacity of ordinary demagogues, in not underestimating the immense power of Public Opinion.

After gleaming the foreign papers carefully, we find that there has been but one slight disturbance of the peace, and that was so trifling, for no one was seriously injured, that it would be hardly worth a notice, did it not illustrate the far-reaching sagacity of O'Connell.

The Repealers of the village of Ashcragh, in the county of Galway, had erected triumphal arches in glorification of the progress of the repeal movement. This irritated the loyal police, one of whom tore down these arches. The repealers thereupon, set to and gave the police a drubbing. This is 'the head and front of their offending.' As soon as O'Connell heard of this really inexcusable conduct, at the great meeting at Tuam, he denounced the conduct of his friends at Ashcragh, directed its name to be stricken from the map of Ireland, as unworthy of a place on Green Erin, and ordered that the names of the violators should be immediately struck from the Repeal Association. O'Connell added, 'If the Police had committed wrong, the law was open to the Repealers, and he promised them that they should not let it be their protection. But the traitors at Ashcragh, instead of resorting to it, violated the very first principle of the Repeal Association, which required that there should be no tumult, no rioting and no violence of any description.'

This is apparently an unimportant fact, but it is one of those little rills which must gain so much strength in their course as finally to swell into a river.

If O'Connell rigidly adheres to this commanding line of conduct, we have not a doubt of the final success of the repeal movement. It cannot fail. The civilized world will feel more sensitively than ever that Ireland is right; and the English Parliament will finally yield to the power of a Public Opinion which is irresistible, because it is based on Right, and which, though firm and unyielding, is not denunciatory or anarchical, but law-abiding.

It may be asked, how feel the English ministry? Sir Robert Peel is evidently frightened—his enemies say, paralyzed. His Tory supporters seem to be falling off; for Wellington and Lindhurst are constantly urging coercive measures forthwith, to put down a mere excitement, lest it may merge in rebellion. These inveterate Tories who care no more about the People than they do for their hounds, are supported by the apostate Brougham. The 'let alone' policy is evidently Sir Robert Peel's system, and we must say we deem it both wise and humane. If the repeal agitation is more excitement, (which we do not believe) it will gradually die away by non-interference, and thus a calm will be eventually produced as effectually, and we believe more certainly, than if produced by the tramp of English armies, and the shedding of rivers of blood, which would be the inevitable result of the cut-throat policy of Lindhurst and Wellington. FROM MEXICO.

Gen. Ampudia entered Tobasco, on the 11th ult., with 3,000 men, and one report says he defeated the troops of General Serranman after an action of two hours, and that Gen. S. then retreated into the country where he would endeavor to recruit his men. This account is contradicted in some particulars. It is stated that as soon as Serranman was informed of the landing of Ampudia, he advanced as far as En Palisada, and there gave battle to the Government troops. The combat was obstinate, and lasted several hours, in spite of the inferiority of the forces under the command of Serranman. Ampudia's troops suffered severe loss. Serranman at length fell back upon Tabasco, where another action took place. Being finally compelled to abandon the town, he withdrew to Candacan, where, at the last accounts, he was strengthening his army in order to assume an offensive attitude. [Cin. Daily Sun.]

THINGS IN PHILADELPHIA. Philadelphia, August 22d, 1843. DESERTION, RUIN AND ATTEMPTED MURDER.

The lower part of the city, or rather Southwark, was thrown into a terrible state of excitement yesterday afternoon about four o'clock, in consequence of a bold attempt to murder a man named Joseph S. Wimer, residing in Catharine street above Sixth. The facts are simply these:

About two years since, Wimer—who is a married man with two children, became acquainted with a beautiful young girl named Mary Crawford, residing as a domestic with Mr. Wm. Walker, paying teller of the Mechanics' Bank, only two doors from Wimer's residence.

During her intimacy with the villain, he carefully concealed the fact of his being a married man, and until after the unsuspecting girl had become the victim of a heartless monster. She subsequently left Mr. Walker's, and after having resided in several other respectable families, this Wimer took her to Wilmington, in order to conceal her situation. Here she was deserted. After her confinement, she returned to the city, and made her sister acquainted with every thing. Soon after, she left the city for Frankford, where she had obtained a situation as nurse.

On Saturday last, her only brother, Joseph Crawford, who was employed as clerk in a grocery store in N. York, arrived at his mother's house, and immediately inquired for his unfortunate sister. Having found her, she revealed every thing. He immediately returned to the city, determined upon revenge. Wimer's dwelling having been pointed out to him by his elder sister, young Crawford entered, and upon Wimer presenting himself, he made a deadly thrust at him with a small sword which he drew from a cane, and stabbed him in the right side. Wimer, falling back into the arms of his wife, declared himself killed. Upon examination, the point of the weapon was found to have struck the seventh rib, directly over the heart, and glanced off, inflicting only a flesh wound.

Crawford immediately fled, but was pursued, overtaken, and carried before Alderman Hoffman, who committed him to prison.

The scene in the office was affecting indeed. The young man related the whole affair which had naturally impelled him to take the life of Wimer; and there appeared but one general feeling among those present—that of sympathy for Crawford, and regret that Wimer's life did not pay the penalty of his crime!

It is rumored that Wimer, who is said to be a roue of considerable notoriety, and a man of dissolute habits, clandestinely married Miss Crawford after effecting her ruin, which, if true, he has added the crime of bigamy to his other guiltiness. It is also said that a certificate of her marriage is in the possession of her relatives, which will be produced as soon as occasion demands.

Had the wound been about one inch lower, it would have produced death.

NAPLES FROM THE SEA AND NAPLES ITSELF: A CONTRAST.

Nothing on the face of the earth, on the face of the waters I ought, perhaps, to say, can exceed the enchanting beauty of the approach to Naples by sea. It is to the eye what the song of the Sirens was to the ear; it ravishes, subdues, and entralls! Forgetful of the other pleasant places of the earth, one could linger for ever amidst the voluptuous harmony of that scenery, wishing for no enjoyment beyond the indolent luxury of dreaming away existence in a clime so soft and bright, where earth, sea, and sky have combined to produce the fairest masterpiece that ever bore the divine impress of an Almighty hand. Beautiful as Naples is when seen from the sea, perhaps no capital in Europe possesses so little interior agreement, and certainly no other city in Italy is so destitute of architectural adornment as this far-famed spot, which derives its principle charm from its peerless position. When you have seen the Chiaja, the Villa Reale, and the Toledo, all is told; for the remainder of the town is composed of dirty, obscure, gloomy streets, swarming with the noisiest, filthiest, and most beggarly population on the face of the globe; and that traveller did not exaggerate, who stated, "that at every step in Naples the fairest prospect that nature ever presented was masked by the outstretched hand of a ragged mendicant." Those who do not beg, steal, and the Neapolitans are second to none, not even to the London swell-mob, in the dexterity with which they pick pockets. Of this extraordinary address I had more than one opportunity of judging during a former visit to Naples, when we were so often eased of our purses and pocket-handkerchiefs in broad day-light, that at last we adopted the precaution of always leaving them at home. But, notwithstanding the exceeding squalor, and the thieving and begging propensities that characterize the populace of Naples, they are by no means a miserable people; their physical wants are so few, their animal spirits so exuberant, that they appear to be insensible to privations which would render the individuals of other nations perfectly wretched. Give a Neapolitan a draught of iced-water, a slice of water-melon, a sunny spot where he may stretch himself to sleep like a dog, and like a dog make his toilette, when he awakes, with a shake and a scratch, and he will ask for nothing more quant à physique. The intellectual pleasures consist in listening to Puccinello, or to some professional story-teller on the Mole, and in dipping his hands into his neighbour's pockets. As for his social enjoyments, who, that has sojourned in Naples, has not observed in the poorer quarters the family groups that are seated in the evening before their doors, their heads in one another's laps, busily engaged in performing for each other those kind offices, the nature of which I must leave to the ingenuity of my readers to discover; and cracking their jokes and other things at the same time with equal zeal and dexterity? Lady Morgan has discovered a great similarity in the moral characteristics of the Neapolitans and the lower Irish; she observes that both possess "the same mixture of fun and ferocity, mirth and misery." Alas! this great disparity exists between them, that the Irish feel their misery and the Neapolitans do not.—Mrs. Romer's the Rhone, &c.

Canada Flour.—The duties heretofore levied upon wheat and flour, the product of the Province of Canada, imported into the United Kingdom from said Province, continues in force until the 10th of October next, after which the following duties are to be substituted therefor:

One shilling per quarter on all such wheat imported into the United Kingdom from Canada, and on each barrel of flour so imported and being the produce of Canada, the same duty which would be levied upon 39 1/2 gallons of wheat. On each quarter of wheat imported into Canada, except from British possessions, 3 shillings sterling is levied, by an Act of the Canadian parliament, which has been sanctioned by the British government.—Both laws are now in force.—[New York Journal of Commerce.]

Three cargoes of British manufactures recently sent from England to China, are estimated at 700,000.—This is doing business on a large scale, but it cannot last long.

A Phenomenon.—A friend who has just returned from the South, tells us that about forty miles this side of Tusculum, on the road to Huntsville, the driver pointed to a large hole in a field, which he said was the greater curiosity in the world. The passengers went to the spot, and found a round hole about twenty feet in diameter, with the earth on all sides apparently solid and overgrown with grass. There was water at the bottom—apparently a hundred feet from the surface. It is at the top of a ridge of earth, upon which, at the distance of twenty rods, stood the deserted dwelling of the owner of the plantation. The driver stated that about three years ago, in the dusk of the evening, the planter was startled by a rumbling noise, and stepping from his door, was astonished to find that a magnificent pine tree, more than a hundred feet high, and a noble oak, which stood by its side, in the open field, had both disappeared! On going to the spot, this hole appeared, but nothing was to be seen of the trees, nor has the top of them ever been reached though a sounding line has been sent down three hundred feet. The planter thought it unsafe to remain so near a neighbor to such a catastrophe, lest that should befall him and his family which befel the pine and the oak and so he removed to another house, a mile distant, yet nothing of the kind has appeared since, and the wonder still remains unaccounted for.—[N. Y. Journal of Commerce.]

FROM THE NEW HAVEN (CON.) HERALD.

NAUVOO AND JOE SMITH.

A gentleman of this town, of undoubted veracity, who has lately spent several weeks at Nauvoo, and among the Mormons, informs us that the general impression abroad in regard to that place and people is very erroneous. During his residence there he became quite familiar with their manners, principles and habits, and says there is not a more industrious, moral and well ordered town in the country. Society is as much diversified there as it is here, the Mormons constituting about two thirds of the population, while all religious sects are as freely tolerated as in any other part of the State. He was at the late trial and acquittal of Joe Smith, and says that the charges against him were of the most frivolous and unsubstantial nature. He is an agreeable man in conversation, is respected by those who know him, and is as much sinned against as sinning. He only claims the privilege of exercising and enjoying his own religion—a privilege which he and his followers cheerfully award to others. They invite immigrants to come among them, and receive those who design to enter into the Mormon community with great attention and kindness. Houses are prepared for their reception, to which they are conducted for that purpose, whose next business it is to attend to their immediate wants and see them comfortably situated. Education is by no means neglected—proper schools and teachers being provided, and temperance reigns throughout. It has now about 16 to 18,000 inhabitants, and promises to become a place of extensive business, four or five steamboats stopping there every day. The gentleman remarked to us that he wished he could speak as well of his own native town as he could of Nauvoo. This is done to us, as no doubt it will be to many, but no one who knows him can doubt the integrity of our informant.

THE NEIGHBOR.

WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 13, 1843.

Nauvoo Boot and Shoe Makers.

In another column will be found an article written by a committee, appointed by a number of boot and shoe makers. How extensively these meetings are attended, whether by a majority or a minority, of the boot and shoe makers of this city, we are unable to determine, as it is a subject entirely new to us. What their plan of operation is, we of course are ignorant; but as they promise to give us the desired information next week, we shall be able to judge.

Home manufacture is a principle that we have always contended for, and the sooner we can manufacture our own leather and shoes, the better will it be, not only for our cordwainers, but for the community at large.

We have seen with regret, great quantities of hides shipped from this place to other markets, when they might as well have been manufactured in Nauvoo; and we have been led to conclude that the persons who followed this traffic, however fair conducted, or inconsiderately carried on, were not friends to the welfare of Nauvoo. We find that the committee calculate that about forty or fifty thousand dollars are sent annually from this place for the purchase of boots and shoes, we think that they have outstepped the mark a little, when we consider the amount that is made in the place. Be this as it may, unquestionably a vast amount of money is expended annually, in the article of boots and shoes; and it is expended in CASH! What is it that the laborer, the mechanic and farmer find the greatest difficulty in obtaining, these hard times? CASH! It certainly would be very desirable then if a plan could be hit upon whereby we could obtain those very useful and necessary articles, without cash, or less of it.

How can this be done? is enquired by many. We would answer by being united, as expressed by the committee of cordwainers, not by a small party being united, but the cordwainers only; but the whole of the inhabitants of the city of Nauvoo and vicinity being united, for their general good.

If our hides were not bought up by speculators and shipped off to other markets, we should have a sufficient quantity of them to manufacture our own leather, this of course would be done at home.—The tanner would either tan on shares, or purchase his hides with leather, an article that all families require, and which if they do not obtain in this way, they will have to pay the money for so that if they sell their hides for money to the merchant, they have to pay that money to the merchant for boots and shoes. The only difference is, that they would have better shoes, and more of them, by obtaining them the first, than the last way; and by this means all the money that now goes out of the place for leather, would be retained in it for other purposes.

Again our boot and shoe makers would then find ample employment, and have an abundance of means to supply their wants, and make their families comfortable. What is it that we are now doing? We know it is not considered; but we are actually sending out of this place many thousands of dollars, every year, to supply mechanics abroad, when our own, who are just as good as they, are many of them making bricks, and carrying the hod. This is a fact, it is too true, and shame that it is true, among an enlightened people. By pursuing another policy we should benefit the whole place. If we manufacture our own leather, and our own shoes, we shall save at least twenty or thirty thousand dollars per year, and then who will be benefited? The shoe maker alone? Verily not; but the whole community. The tanner and shoe maker will have labor, and what is sufficient for them, and laborers instead of shoe makers will have to dig and carry the hod. The shoe maker and tanner will want houses building; and they will need brick, stone, lime and labor; they will be enabled to pay for the labor and materials by their own industry; and the persons thus employed will be able to employ others, and pay them too; and thus merchants, tailors, brick makers and layers, carpenters, lime burners, farmers, laborers, &c. &c. (we had like to have forgot the printers) would be indirectly benefited by this mode of proceeding. Thirty thousand dollars per year, that now goes out of the city would be retained in it, the city of course would be so much richer; and it would place within the reach of the inhabitants of this city, thirty thousand dollars worth of the comforts, conveniences and necessities of life, that is now entirely beyond our control, and which we are forced to do without, through the present ill-directed policy. It will be seen from the above remarks that it is the interest of all of the community to pursue this policy; and we would here recommend to our farmers, and to all that have the article, if they wish well for the interests of Nauvoo, not to sell their hides to merchants; but either get them tanned on shares or sell them to the tanners in Nauvoo for leather. We shall thus dry up one of the great fountains of evil.

Another difficulty that we have to cope with at the present, is the importation of so many ready-made shoes. It is customary and policy in merchants to import such articles as are the most needed, and the readiest sale and yield the most profit. If boots and shoes are an article of this kind, of course it would be to their interest to import them. But let us here suggest an idea, in our own infantile state, whilst we have not a sufficient quantity of leather to supply the demand of this place; would it not be better to purchase leather and bring it to this place, and let the workmanship be done here, and thus for the time being save at least one half in the city; and make the hearts of many a poor man glad. It may be here stated that workmanship cannot be done as cheap here. We have conversed with those most competent to know, and are assured, that there are men from the very shops where the imported shoes are manufactured; and that they can, and will work as cheap here as there; and that the same kinds of work can and will be done, for the same prices, under the same circumstances. The merchant could either have his boots and shoes made here or sell his leather at retail, in either of which cases his profits would be as large as by importing and selling boots and shoes; at all events he would have the satisfaction of supplying with labor and bread many a poor family. The community at any rate, can govern these things by using home manufacture.

The plans of the cordwainers' society we of course can say nothing about; but would advise them to let their plans be liberal, and seek not their own benefit alone; but the benefit of the whole community; let them work on reasonable terms, and then people will see it to their interest to employ them, and interest in matters of trade will generally bear rule. Let the temple of 'union' which they are erecting be made sufficiently large, not only to contain themselves, but the whole of the city of Nauvoo and vicinity; let their plans and pursuits be liberal, enlarged and philanthropic, and let them remember that there are other poor, as well as the 'suffering boot and shoe makers.'

CARTHAGE as NAUVOO.

We have been not a little amazed of late, to hear of the proceedings of some of our modern Appolos, in the ancient, alias modern city of Carthage.

If we could only believe in the transmigration of souls, we should really think that the spirit of Hannibal, after having been encased in the body of a bear, an ass, a wolf, a snake, and vulture, and having partook more or less of the nature of those several bodies, had come down by lineal descent upon Walter Bagby, Collector, and that Constable, Wilson, of modern Carthage, if Missouri Boggs had been dead possessed his spirit. As he is not, however, we think that the spirit of Cowles, or some other ancient worthy, has taken possession of him. Be that as it may, we think that these two dignitaries are anxious to immortalize their memory, and perpetuate their fame, and we would gladly help them to do so.

When Hannibal, the great Carthaginian Chief, crossed the Alps for the purpose of taking Rome by surprise, and conquering it, he was quite as indefatigable in his exertions to subjugate the Roman empire, as the modern Hannibal, (for we shall now call him by that name,) is to destroy Nauvoo. As the friend therefore, of Hannibal the modern, (we mean tax-gatherer Hannibal, not General Hannibal,) we would advise him before he sets out on his classical expedition, in endeavoring to immortalize his name, by treading in the steps of his great prototype, to count well the cost, lest instead of destroying Rome alias Nauvoo; he should, as did ancient Hannibal, bring ruin upon Carthage. When General Hannibal raised his army to cross the Alps, he raised a numerous force, but he met with one difficulty, in the assembly not furnishing him with supplies. So, when our collector Hannibal, thinks of setting off across the Alps, alias prairie with his aid, constable Wilson, on his modern expedition to destroy Nauvoo, he had better arrange with his congress, alias nob in Carthage, to furnish him with supplies while on his expedition; but he has one expedient that General Hannibal had not, and that is in selling lots for taxes, after they have been paid for.

We suppose that in beating up for volunteers, Hannibal (the collector,) through the assistance of his aid, constable Wilson, and some other disappointed would be official (as who pricks neither of them will have any pickings this season) had somewhere between two or three hundred collected, before whom stood the immortal Hannibal, (the collector,) all present were petrified by the thrilling appeals of eloquence that flowed from the lips of our soul inspired, and inspiring general, alias Hannibal the collector. We are informed that they passed certain resolutions; but we have not yet been honored with a perusal of them.

We have heard of a Nigger meeting which may not be inappropriate.

I say Sambo!—says Jim, a very interesting Nigger; I says Sambo, and all ob you jammem ob color;—dis Nigger mokes dat Massa Leopoldi Augustuni Washington, my uncles nephew, be de president ob dese United States; what says all ob ye niggers and massa president ha! ha! ha! I second de motion of de former jammem;—says Ned, Massa President, says Sambo, put it to de muster.

All ob you jammem ob color who sabar Leopoldi Augustuni Washington, signify it by saying aye. Carried all but one, —germen put dat one dam nigger out for not voting for de president ob de United States, when all ob dese gemmen voted in de firmative.

We are informed that at the Carthaginian meeting, that because one man voted in the negative, it was moved that he be put out.

For the Neighbor.

Mr. Burrows—Happening to be at Carthage on the 6th inst., and hearing of an Anti-Slavery meeting, I had the curiosity to listen if pos-

able, the reason of their inordinate hatred of the Negroes. I have seen and known enough of them to judge somewhat of the truth or the falsity of the charge brought against them. Accordingly I went in—not in time to witness the commencement, but early enough to ascertain something of the spirit which was working in and out of a certain portion of those assembled in the court house. There were some two hundred persons collected, five or six being having any thing to say, and three, perhaps, taking an active part in voluntee A. M. Aldridge was acting as president, and Mr. Bagby as chairman of a committee on resolutions. No regular speeches were made, and what was said was rather dry and wanting in those ingredients which would interest an audience. It is necessary when a body meet together for grave deliberations, that they should have truth and justice, and common sense to go upon. Did they have these? Let us look a little further. Bagby being called upon to present ten resolutions, attached to a very elaborate preamble. This preamble ascribes to the Mormon leaders, and especially the prophet, the latest deception and hypocrisy; calling Joseph Smith "the latter day would be Mahomet, a modern Galgula," and charges the Mormon people generally, with the most outrageous and flagrant crimes; speaks of them as "a clan of devils, of a race of devils, who, by the aid of their 'mock courts,' were setting the laws of the land at defiance; that this people ascribed a dangerous influence to political questions, and were often perpetrating wrongs, and thus envenoming the lives of respectable citizens. These together with other charges were prefaced, false and mean as the black and craven hearts from which they came. This famous or infamous preamble, and resolutions, then passed, will soon be published, and you will then learn more of this spirit than I can now describe. It is sufficient for me to give my opinion, which is, if they are published to the world, they will rear for their authors a monument of infamy. I have been in various parts of the land, and I trust I know something of the genius and spirit, characteristic of the American people. Never before have I listened to the tongue of slander so bitter and violent, nor seen the hand of persecution lifted so high against any people for their religion—never have I beheld any portion of my countrymen so abused for participating in the rights and privileges, belonging equally to all American citizens. The mobocratic feelings and sentiments expressed at Carthage on the 6th, would have made a New England community a howl for very shame, and a body of high-minded gentlemen in any quarter of the R. public, would have felt themselves disgraced in giving utterance to such ebullitions of malice and revenge. In addition to Bagby, Aldridge & Co., a Col. Williams, (Hoober) with some others whose names I did not learn, gave indications of a condition devoid of inflammable and vindictive, strengthening the fact, that the "Hoober" generally where they are found in the non-slaveholding states, give an idea of the selfishness, ignorance, and of southern society. There are exceptions, but there is a certain class, who, being idle, despised and abandoned, become the instruments for crime and murder. They seemed to me like a band of pirates, plotting the destruction of the innocent, and consulting themselves with the idea of the spoils of their victims. They knew full well the utter falsity of their complaints, that from beginning to end, their charges are but a tissue of falsehoods, dark as Erebus, and they are throwing this lie to the world, that if possible, they may induce mankind with the same vindictive and blood thirsty spirit, toward an innocent and harmless people, which they themselves possess. Shall we comment on the principles of such characters as these? No, let those names not be uttered, let their sultry and pollute the lips. On the passage of the resolutions, one man voted in the negative, on them all—whereupon, feeling their dignity highly insulted, they were for thrusting him down stairs, at arm's length, but after a short consultation they concluded to wait awhile, inasmuch as it would have been attended with some difficulty, for he happened to be one of those specimens of human nature, not made to be driven. They appointed a committee in Carthage, in connection with the adjoining counties, also sub-committees in each precinct, to ascertain how much assistance they could depend upon against the Mormons. I left the house then, and cannot say whether they came to any important conclusions after or not. Some of them, I should judge, concluded to get heavily drunk; at any rate this was the fact. Strangers were actually insulted and outraged, and drunk men and profanity reigned for a season in Carthage. Hancock county, September 9, 1843.

For the Neighbor.

Mr. Editor:—I have read with astonishment a letter which appeared in the Neighbor of the 23rd ult., over the signature of J. Hall, written at Independence, Mo. Indeed I cannot sufficiently express my surprise when reading that letter. Missouri has ever been making a great noise about her nationality, and has been bawling continually about her patriotism, and strict adherence to, and distribution of justice; yet the principles of many of her citizens are so corrupt that they cannot do any thing just or honorable. They have at length fairly discovered their eleven feet. They profess to the world to be a law abiding people; that they are more intent upon executing the law on offenders than any other people. So much for profession. They now tell us they will have Jo Smith for trial. The next paragraph informs us that "If Rockwell should be discharged on trial the powers of man cannot save him." This has been the case with many others that might be mentioned before Rockwell. They plead justification to exterminate free born American citizens, called Mormons; because, forsooth, old Boggs ordered it. And if they were discharged on trial the power of man could not save them. The blood of innocent men, women and children is now crying day and night to God against them for revenge, and though he bear long with them; yet will he avenge his elect.

I was raised in one of the southern States where it is said, all kinds of wickedness and barbarity was exercised; but never did I hear of such cursed acts as I have heard in the short history of Mo. A Negro burnt alive, prisoners murdered while the sheriff held a respite in his hand, and wicked at by the government, murder, rapine, plundering, and firing houses; carried on under executive patronage, by authority of an exterminating order, of a modern Nero! No wonder Hall tells us that, "If they were discharged on trial the power of man could not save them." Yet so intent on shedding innocent blood, they will have Jo Smith for trial! Hear all the world! all ye honest men and women! what is the use of a trial? If he should be discharged on trial the power of man could not save him." Great God! who ever heard of such a requisition, and yet such a declaration accompanying it! They will have Smith for trial, yet if he should be discharged, on trial, the power of man could not save him!—he would be murdered! Now if they fail to get him delivered up to murder him, they will not doubt call for others of the citizens of Nauvoo, to glut their murderous hate. Never did such a black spot cover any portion of one of the States of this grand confederacy as now covers Missouri. And I will venture to predict that if ever a Mormon is delivered over to them and he should be discharged on trial, the power of man cannot save him! Hall, when speaking of our State, declares there can be but little virtue in the community, and little honesty in the officers of law. He proceeds with this kind of tirade and abuse, and why?—because, forsooth, our Governor will not trample on the powers of law, and justice, and deliver a citizen of Illinois into the hands of the hellish inquisition of Missouri, to be mocked, tortured, and murdered, because "if he was discharged on trial, the power of man could not save him." Missouri has tortured herself and her law; she has made every kind of exertion, ordinary and extraordinary; and has greatly desired to prefer a plausible charge against Joseph Smith, so that they might get him into their mobocratic hands to murder him, as they have done others before. He was arrested again and again, and tried for an alleged offence against the laws of Missouri, and acquitted. He has been tried by the Court of the United States for the District of Illinois and discharged; and, as our officers are not murderers, but have the fear of God before their eyes, "the power of man did save him." Hall relies very much on the statements of Reynolds, a barbarous, unfeeling demon, who would mistreat and abuse a prisoner, arrested by authority of law. Nor would he permit the prisoner to have the benefit of counsel; but contrary to every thing sacred, when his authority was demanded, he presented a loaded pistol in a threatening manner, as his authority. He exercised so much cruelty that the citizens of Dixon, though strangers to the parties, rose as one man and compelled the mobocrats, Reynolds and Wilson, to yield to the violated laws.

On a writ of Habeas Corpus the parties started for Nauvoo, Reynolds still exercising his barbarity over Mr. Smith, (as testified to by the lawyers in company.) They met on their way a company of men from Nauvoo, destined for Ottawia, where they expected the trial; they were going thither as witnesses. They were indeed competent witnesses, as some of them had been wounded and maimed in Missouri, and were acquainted with all the circumstances.

Reynolds and Wilson now became alarmed for their own personal safety. No doubt Reynolds's guilty conscience bringing to his mind the innocent sufferers he had contributed to murder, rob of their chastity and property, and burn their houses &c., in Missouri.

Now ye that fear God and love mercy, give heed. Mr. Smith (and I will say Brother Joseph, for I am proud of my relationship with a man possessing such a generous soul notwithstanding he was suffering in his flesh for the bruises they had inflicted; he told them he would spill his blood for them before they should be barbarously treated, or unlawfully dealt with. He was Reynolds's prisoner, and Reynolds and Wilson were prisoners of the sheriff of Leo County. They all came to Nauvoo; and on their arrival, Smith was given up to the Municipal Court for trial; he was honorably discharged, and "the power of man" did once more "save him." He kept his pledge to those thirty blood hounds when they arrived at Nauvoo. The prophet, the man of God, had a good dinner prepared, and set them at the head of the table, and waited on them politely and courteously, with the best, exerted himself to make them comfortable on the best, and allowed them free exercise of mind, body and limb, without a chain about them. Americans who love your country, glory to view the contrast of treatment, "the power of man" yes the man of God, "did save them." When they had made him a pludge in Missouri, and he had given himself up to the dastardly, cowardly, inhuman band, they chained him down fast, and when he complained, tightened his chains and then fed him and others with him on human flesh! Again, as soon as they, Reynolds and Wilson, left Nauvoo, they endeavored to excite a mob by reiterating base falsehoods about us. Now you see that he who is called the worst man in the nation, every thing that is bad, yet he has more generosity and honor than all Missouri; with murderous Boggs, and all his exterminating power. And all the family of God, as one exclaimed, along with him! All those wonderful descendants could not keep a single pledge! Hall says "Missouri will have Jo Smith for trial, and if Illinois cannot capture the prophet it will be an easy matter to raise Nauvoo to the ground!" but if our Governor is so imbecile as not to allow such a course of conduct, he must be impeached and a new, energetic, and honorable man placed in his stead. So intent is he on murder, rapine and plunder, Nauvoo must be razed. Yes beauty and booty, and outrage. Nauvoo is peopled with various denominations of professed Christians, as a so many who do not belong to any church. Yet it will be right in the sight of Missouri and the father of murder and falsehood, the devil, to exterminate the city of Nauvoo, and the world and even dethrone Jehovah. Old Boggs, a second Nero, who declared he desired to see the end of all things before his death, caused the city of Rome to be set on fire, and while the destruction of life and property was going on, he placed himself in the Tower of Antonia, and played on his harp to the tune of the destruction of Troy. Afterwards to cover up his cursed act, he fixed the odium of this on the Christians. Thus it was in Missouri, all the hellish crimes committed under exterminating Nero was fixed on the Latter Day Saints, and a fell excuse for murder, "beauty and booty."

Hall says "Holy Jo was not afraid of the injustice of our people," yet he says "the power of man cannot save him." I now ask who does believe him a truthful honest man? Poor wretched, blood-thirsty creature, he can at best contradict himself, with all their cursed unlawful deeds of murder, rape, and plunder; he is wonderful honest, and associated with such as himself. I do not mean to impute all the citizens of Missouri; but I know the contamination has spread far and wide, even among men who never perhaps saw a Mormon, nor have they the least evidence of the circumstances that have caused their deadly hate. Here is honesty for a truth—"with many of these individuals 'the power of man could not save a Mormon, they are so much under the influence of the spirit of injustice. So now Sir I have shown you that if Hall speaks of contamination he has not proven any thing; but I have as regards contamination and influence of unholy spirits. These are matters of fact. The world cannot but see them. Although entirely unaccustomed to writing for the press, I am not unapprised of the awkward style in which my address is written; but in discharge of my duty to God, and my country, that the world may know the truth, I have written it. As ever yours, A. YOUNG.

FOR THE NEIGHBOR. A WORD FROM THE SUFFERING BOOT AND SHOE MAKERS.

MR. EDITOR:—Sir, One of the most important subjects that seem to engross the attention of the citizens of Nauvoo, is the meeting held by the Boot and Shoe Makers. Many false conjectures are made about it; and Mr. Sumner, (that great equestrian of modern times,) is riding, rough-shod, upon the back of rumor. But, Sir, by your permission, we will attempt to disabuse the public mind in relation to the private meetings that have been held recently in this city, by the journeymen Boot and Shoemakers. It has been understood and believed by some, that the object of the Shoemakers is to form a combination to raise the price of boots and shoes, which would prove oppressive to the community at large. Such, however, is not the fact—their object being to associate together, and to consult, and deliberate on the best and most efficient way of competing with the Eastern manufactures, and consequently giving employment to about two hundred boot and shoe makers, which would carry peace and happiness to the firesides of many disconsolate families, who have come hither in accordance with the commands of God, and are willing to labor with their own hands at their own business, whereunto they have been called.

Our weekly meetings take place every Monday evening at 6 o'clock, at the house of Thonas Jaap, on Main street, opposite the "Masonic Hall Tavern;" and it is very requisite that all the craft should attend, and give to the meeting all the knowledge they may have on the subject; because if we cannot compete with the East, all our efforts to better the condition of this particular class, will be rendered futile. A calculation has been made, which proves that for the past year there must have been exported from this city, about forty or fifty thousand dollars; and as it only requires about one-third to purchase the material, it is obvious that two-thirds would be retained in this place, and thereby benefit the whole community. We therefore consider that it would be perfect folly to attempt to show to our fellow citizens the advantages that would eventually accrue to them, by supporting this branch of domestic manufacture. Should this most desirable object be obtained, and why should it not? the labor can be obtained as cheap here as in the East. The best of boot fitters and binders can be had at Eastern prices, provided constant employment be given.

Provisions are cheaper. Then what is there to hinder? All that is wanted, is a little capital to enable us to purchase our material at Eastern prices, as the freight, drayage, &c., for a quantity is so trifling, that it will scarcely make any perceptible difference in the price of boots and shoes. But for us to pay 33-1/3 for a pound of sole leather by the side, is destructive of every principle of domestic manufacture. However, Sir, there is a plan which can be entered into, which will fully establish the business in this place, whatever may oppose it to the contrary notwithstanding; and in your next, we will give you that plan, should the society deem it proper. To conclude, Sir, we would quote the language of the celebrated Glasgow spinners; that, "the working man's only protection—his only covert from the storm—his only sanctuary from the tempest—is Union—union will rise with towering grandeur to the skies—meet every storm—every inquiry—standing like the everlasting rocks—throwing back the vile insinuations thrown against it, like the surge of the tempestuous ocean—let working men stand to the order, and sustain their rights, and standing by them, still maintain them: be calm, firm, determined, resolute—make Union your guiding star—justice your helm, peace your object, and you shall triumph. Union walls are high and grand, Union walls, if ably manned, Union walls are made to stand Against the strongest foe."

INTERESTING PUBLIC RECORDS.

From the Liverpool Albion.

There has just been presented to both Houses of Parliament, by command of her Majesty, the fourth Report of the Deputy Keeper of the Public Records. Like the preceding report, it contains many curious details and notices, mixed, however, with unavoidably dry narrative and registration of documents. The records in the Wakefield Tower are classed under reigns. In the "Calendar of Royal and other Letters, Writs, and some few Patents," there are notices of some documents, the very titles and objects of which have a singular effect in our times. Thus, among entries for Henry III.'s reign, are the following:—(No. 39.)—William, elect of Ely, to the King, certifying that Nicholas de Brinkendal, clerk, a scholar of Chmbridge, imprisoned in Cambridge on a charge of homicide, ought lawfully to be tried before an ecclesiastical court, and praying that the said Nicholas may be given up to him for the purpose; 1255. (No. 40.)—Robert, Bishop of Lincoln, to the King, praying that the scholar clerk detained at Oxford on a charge of "robbing the Jews of Oxford" may be delivered to him to be tried in the ecclesiastical court. Kettlesby, 22d April, 1244; 29 Henry III. (No. 107.)—Louis, King of France, to the King of England, commanding that, as Duke of Aquitan, he would appoint a certain day and place in Gascony for Renaud de Pontibus (Pons) and his wife to do their homage concerning "Gentiac" and its appurtenances, and would send them letters of safe conduct for going to and returning from the said place; and, further, that he would order his seneschals of Gascony and Perigord to summon the witnesses, whom the said Renaud and his wife have against the king of England. Foderar, vol. 1, p. 418, (No. 109.)—Louis, King of France to the King of England, stating, that certain merchants of the territory of James, King of Arragon, complaining that some "mle factors" of England had seized their goods on the sea, and praying that restitution may be made. [No. 117.]—Margaret, Queen of France to the King of England, thanking him for his enquiries after her health, and stating that though much desiring the society of her sister, the Queen of England, she would hasten the departure of the Queen to him, according to his request because she feared that, on account of her long delay, he would "marry some other lady"; and that "as long as the Countess of Gloucester remained in his vicinity, she should be impatient until she knew that her sister had rejoined him." (No. 118.)—Margaret, Queen of France, to the King of England, begging him to inform her of his condition, which she was most anxious to learn, and praye God to prosper; and that he would state if there was anything she could do for him. The King, (her husband,) herself, and children are all well. (No. 163.)—The Echevius and Burgesses of Ghent, to the King of England, "being so full of business, they cannot at present pay the debt they owe him," wherefore they beg a receipt until the next Michaelmas. (No. 185.)—The King, to Herbert de Burgh, Justiciar of England, commanding him to address letters to Sheriffs, "For egesters" and others, "ordering them to desist from troubling the Lepers of Lancaster." (Sealed with the seal of W. de Caillupe, "because the King had not his seal with him.") 1220. (No. 188.)—The King to his Treasurer and Chamberlains, commanding them to pay 30s. (thirty shillings) to Thomas de Wymundham, his clerk, "for writing thirty pair of statutes, (triginta paria statutorum), to be sent to all the Justices in Eyre, and Sheriffs throughout the realm, and, also, 4s. 6d. for parchment on which he wrote the statutes." (No. 228.)—W. Earl Warren, to Hubert de Burgh, Justiciar of England, urging his necessities. He owes one hundred pounds to the Earl of Arundel, which he is obliged to pay at the First of St. John, and has no other resource but the Justiciar's kindness, "being unable to obtain money from either Jews or Christians, and owing large debts to the Crusaders, to be paid out of his own property;" he, therefore, begs the Justiciar to defer the time for payment of the sum for which he and W. Marescal were pledges, and tells him, that "in so doing he will confer a greater kindness than if he had promised him a thousand pounds after the Feast of St. John." (No. 251.)—G. de Marisch, Justiciar of Ireland, to Hubert de Burgh, Justiciar of England, stating, that he was unable, on the account of his mother's illness, to attend at Nottingham, on the Octaves of the Holy Trinity, according to the order of the King in Council. He, therefore, begs Hubert de Burgh, and the rest of the King's Council, to appoint a day after the return of the King from York, "to consider the affairs of Ireland." (1 About 1220: 4 Hen. 3.) (No. 317.)—Neither the name of the writer, nor that of the person to whom the letter is addressed, appears. The writer wishes to be excused from going to the York Circuit with Martin de Patibull, for the said Martin is strong, and in his labour so sedulous and practised that all his fellows, especially W. de Raleigh and the writer, "are overpowered by the labour of Patibull, who works every day from sunrise until night." The writer, therefore, prays to be eased of his office, and allowed to go quietly to his church in the county of York, to which he had been lately presented, and to have letters of dispensation.

105—We were not aware that express business had any thing to do with the non-payment of debts; until the present; as it is the case however, we hope that some of our delinquents will soon get through with their burry; and if they cannot, and will mention it to us, we will

GREAT LOSS OF LIFE AND PROPERTY.

The late storm in Philadelphia did immense damage. The north east and north west sections of the city and suburbs have suffered to an immense extent; houses have been unroofed and blown down; boat yards and coal wharves swept away; shipping disabled and dismasted; cellars inundated, and a vast amount of property partially ruined or wholly destroyed.

Amongst the public buildings severely injured were the Walnut street Theatre (two feet water in the first lobby) Gas Works, Market street Bridge, Magdalen Asylum, Asylum for the Blind, Permanent Bridge, Button Factory, Darby Creek Bridge, (swept away with two persons who were on it,) Kelley's Mills, and various others.

Ten or a dozen houses were blown down, about fifty houses unroofed, several persons killed, and many more severely injured.

When the storm commenced it rained a perfect deluge. It is impossible, at present, to make any correct estimate of the amount of the loss. Suffice it to say that it is immense, and there is no reasonable means of calculating its extent at present. [Cincinnati Daily Sun.

The Philosopher and the Ferryman.—A philosopher stepped on board a ferryboat to cross a stream. On his passage he enquired of the ferryman if he understood arithmetic. The man looked astonished. "Arithmetic! No, sir, never heard of it before." The philosopher replied, "I am very sorry, for one quarter of your life is gone." A few minutes after he asked the ferryman, "Do you know anything of mathematics?" The boatman smiled, and replied "No!" "Well, then," said the philosopher, "another quarter of your life is lost." A third question was asked the ferryman, "Do you understand astronomy?" "Oh, no, sir; never heard of such a thing!" "Well, my friend, then another quarter of your life is lost." Just at this moment the boat ran on a snag, and was sinking, when the ferryman jumped up, pulled off his coat, and asked the philosopher, with great earnestness of manner, "Sir, can you swim?" No, said the philosopher. "Well, then," said the ferryman, "your whole life is lost, for the boat's going to the bottom."—Jonathan.

From discoveries made at Liverpool there is no doubt that the recent conflagrations in that town have been the work of a band of diabolical incendiaries.

STRAYED FROM THE TEMPLE.

ABOUT two months ago a dark brown Cow, white face, carries her head high, lop horned, bright eye, a white spot on one hind foot, white on the end of the tail, white bag, rather short teats, nine years old last spring, she was expected to calve in a few days when she went away; she is not a very large Cow but pretty stout built.

ALSO, a black Cow, white face, white feet, lower part of tail white, had a dirty red and white band on her horns across her forehead, she was very poor, when she went away, gave a little milk, had no calf, rather a small sized Cow, and about seven years old as near as can be remembered.

Whoever will give information of either or both of the Cows to the Temple Committee or the Temple Recorder, or will bring them to the Temple, will do us a favor, and if they desire it a reasonable compensation shall be allowed for trouble and expenses.

The descriptions are as near as can be remembered, but only having them here a little while it may possibly not be exactly correct.

POETRY.

THE POET'S THEME.

They've sung of Love, and Hope, and Faith,
In every tongue and land,
Of peace and war, of Life and Death,
The gifted poet band.
The loftiest hill, the lowliest vale,
Sun, earth, and moon's soft beam,
Have greeted the bard's bewitching tale,
Have formed his beautiful theme.

They've sung the mighty names of old,
Saints, warriors, heroes gone,
More firmly 'mid their lays enrolled
Than on memorial stone.
They've sung of many a greenwood bower,
Of many a rippling stream,
Nay—even the "mountain daisy's" flower
Hath been a poet's theme.

Surely this mighty flood of song,
Flowing from day to day,
All lovely thoughts hath swept along,
All fancies borne away;
Where "neath the midnight's starry cope,
Or mid day's sunny dream,
Where may the earnest minstrel hope
To find another theme?

Still youthful hearts will overflow
With nature's sympathies;
Still youthful souls will proudly glow
With undimmed energies;
Whilst Love and Hope, the bosom's chords, Shall touch with power supreme,
Doubt not their thoughts will still find words,
And minstrels have a theme.

The poet eases with other eyes
Than the dull crowd around,
For him new thoughts and dreams arise,
From each sweet sight and sound;
The rolling of the mighty sea,
The lightning's flashing gleams,
Can these and things as glorious, be Weary and worn out themes?

And while the human breast gets thrills
With hopes, and joys, and fears,
And while the human eye yet fills
With sympathetic tears;
Whilst one fond heart shall wildly poet
In passion's fevered dream,
Trust me, the poet shall not want
For song and harp, a theme.

LETTER OF FRANKLIN.

The November number of the Southern Literary Messenger publishes the following excellent and interesting letter written by Dr. Benjamin Franklin, to a minister of the Gospel in New Jersey, among whose papers it was recently discovered. It has never before been published.

Philadelphia, June 6, 1765.

Dear Sir: I received your kind letter of the 2nd inst., and am glad to hear that you increase in strength. I hope you will continue mending until you recover your former health and firmness. Let me know whether you continue the cold bath, and the effect it has. As to the kindness you spoke of, I wish I could have been of more real service to you; that you would always be ready to serve any other person that may need your assistance, and as I am employed in serving others, I do not look upon myself as conferring favors, but as paying debts. In my travels, and since my settlement, I have received much kindness from men, to whom I shall never have an opportunity of making the least direct return, and numberless mercies from God, who is infinitely above being benefited by our services. For the kindness of men, I can therefore only show my gratitude to God, by a readiness to help his other children and my brethren; for I do not think that thanks and compliments, though repeated weekly, can discharge our real obligations to each other, and much less to our Creator.

You will see in this my notion of good works, that I do not expect to merit heaven by them. By heaven we understand a state of happiness, infinite in degree, and eternal in duration; we can do nothing to deserve such a reward. He that, for giving a draught of water to a thirsty person, should expect to be paid with a great plantation, would be modest in his demands, compared with those who think they deserve heaven for the little good they can do on earth. Even the mixed imperfect pleasures we enjoy in this world are rather from God's goodness than our merit—how much more the happiness of heaven! For my part, I have not the vanity to think I deserve it, the folly to expect it, or the ambition to desire it; but content myself in submitting to the disposal of that God who made me, who has hitherto preserved and blest me, and in whose fatherly goodness I may well confide, that he never will make me miserable, and that the affliction I may at any time suffer may tend to my benefit.

The faith you mention has doubtless its use in the world. I do not desire to see it diminished, nor would I desire to see it lessened in any man; but I wish it were productive of more good works than I have seen; I mean real good works—works of kindness, charity and public spirit—not holiday keeping, sermon hearing, or reading, despised even by wise men, and much less capable of pleasing the Deity.

The worship of God is a duty; the learning and reading may be useful; but if a man in hearing and praying, (as too many do,) it is as if the tree should value itself on being watered, and putting forth leaves, though it never produced any fruit.

Our Good Master thought less of these outward appearances than many of his modern disciples. He preferred the doors of his word to the hearers; the son that seemingly refused to obey his father, and yet performed his commandments, to him that professes his readiness but neglects his work. The heretical, but charitable, those who gave food to the hungry, drink to the thirsty, and raiment to the naked, entertainment to the stranger, who never heard of his name, he declares shall in the last day be accepted, when those who cry Lord! Lord! who value themselves on their faith, though great enough to perform miracles, but have neglected good works shall be rejected. He promised that he came not to call the righteous but sinners to repentance, which implied his modest opinion, that there was some in his time so good that they need not hear even him for improvement; but now-a-days, we have scarcely a little parson, who does not think it the duty of every man within his reach to sit under his own petty ministration, and that, whoever omits this offense God. I wish to such more humility, and to you health and firmness—being your friend and servant,

A VIEW OF LONDON.

Rome was called the Mistress of the World, yet in its palmy days was not equal to Britain in power or dominion; nor can any of the boasted cities of antiquity—Carthage, Tyre, or Alexandria; or in latter times, Venice or Genoa—when their maritime greatness was in its glory, and their trade the wonder and admiration of their respective ages; not one can bear a moment's comparison with London. Britain's trade claims the whole habitable globe for its operations. Her colonies are placed in every direction where man can exist. Upon her dominion the sun never sets; her flag waves upon every sea, and a volume would be required to detail the results of her maritime enterprise and internal trade upon the aspect of the city which forms the centre of these mighty operations.

In population, London is a nation herself; the number of inhabitants has doubled in 40 years, and now amounts to one million nine hundred thousand. In 1843 it will contain two millions! In length, from east to west, the houses extend in one line between five and six miles, and in breadth, from north to south nearly four. But if we include Chelsea at one extreme, and Blackwall at the other, and take the breadth from Waltham to Holloway—and these are now certainly portions of the great City—we shall have London covering above thirty miles of square ground! And then her river, bearing upon its surface the ships of every nation; and her docks—the East and West India Docks, the London Docks, the Commercial Docks, and St. Katharine's Docks, together covering more than five hundred acres, teeming with valuable commodities; and one of them, the West India Dock, capable of accommodating 500 large ships.

To the port of London alone, in 1840, there belonged 2850 ships of 501,000 tons burden, and manned by 32,000 seamen; in the same year there entered the port from British colonies 1033 ships; from Ireland, 907 ships; from foreign countries, 3255; which, with 3106 British vessels, formed one year's trade. What can compare with this? London contains one hundred thousand inhabited houses, one-half of them having shops attached. The yearly consumption of porter and ale is 2,000,000 barrels, all brewed in the place; of sheep 1,403,460 have been sold in Smithfield in one year, together with 163,000 head of cattle. Many miles of ground in the vicinity are occupied as market gardens, and have spread over them many hundred acres of glass. 70,000,000 of foreign eggs are imported, to say nothing of the millions produced at home; 12,000 cows afford an insufficient supply of milk; the Irish and Dutch send immense quantities of butter. Ireland also, supplies bacon and pork.

The water companies send into the houses 227,000,000 hogsheads of water in a year; the gas companies produce 10,000,000 cubic feet of gas daily, which feeds 100,000 lights; the paving for a year costs above £300,000; the sewer rates £400,000. There are six thousand hotels, taverns and coffee-houses, and twenty theatres, besides concert-rooms, and exhibitions of various kinds. London issues nearly 30,000,000 of newspapers; has steamboat accommodations for 10,000 passengers daily; from London extends 1000 miles of railway, laid down at an expense of £47,000,000; with fifty-nine canals, at a cost of £14,000,000. Through the Post Office pass 10,000,000 of letters in a year, whilst the amount of cash paid by the London Bankers, through the clearing house in 1841, averaged £75,000,000 monthly. Will not these few facts assist in giving some idea of the immense scale upon which all that relates to London must be considered, before a correct knowledge of its state can be arrived at?—Illustrated News.

FROM THE ITHICA JOURNAL. DISTRESSING INTELLIGENCE FROM OREGON.

The following letter contains the sad intelligence of death by drowning of several persons, with whom many of our readers are acquainted, who emigrated from the state and section. It will be read with melancholy interest:

Oregon, Willamette Falls, }
Feb. 3, 1843. }

My dear Sarepta—I sit down to pen you tidings that will thrill through your heart, and so sicken your soul, that I advise you to go and pray before you read another line.

On the first day of this month, as Esq. Crocker, Mr. Rogers and his lady, (who was once Satira Leslie), and her youngest sister, with myself and four poor Indians, were passing down by the rock to get on a log to walk ashore; the water being high and the current strong; it barely passed, giving space for me to step on to the log as I was standing in the canoe, when it began to drive out into the current. Esq. Crocker seized the end of the paddle I held in my hand, and each exerted ourselves to draw the canoe to the log a second time, but it was in vain; he let go as he was likely to draw himself out of the canoe, and in an instant that large, sound, well conditioned canoe of the Missions, was in spite of every effort of all on board, hurried away and hurled down the dreadful falls sending every soul save two poor Indians, into eternity in a moment. As yet, my dear wife, not even a body has been found. I stood on the log, chilled and motionless with horror, and witnessed the dreadful scene. They went down within four rods of me—Satira only uttering one dreadful scream as they passed over the falls. The two Indians were saved by jumping overboard and swimming seemingly against impossibilities, to the shore, in those dreadful rapids two rods above the falls. This horrible disaster has filled the place and colony with consternation and deep affliction.

Oh, what a sad and dreadful blow to poor dear Mr. Crocker and all his connections. I pray God to sustain them under this tremendous blow. He had spent the last two months at my house; and his mildness, condescension, and pleasant, agreeable manners, will never be forgotten.—He and I were on our way to Ft. George together, and had spent the day agreeably, conversing on various topics of interest—each calculating on a longer stay, and more to do in this world. He was delighted with the country, and had bright hopes and cheering prospects. The hospitality and generosity of the people of this country greatly pleased him, and on the other hand he was universally more than respected—he was gaining upon the best affections and kindest regards of the people, and seemed destined to be generally esteemed and beloved. But he is gone, and I am left; and well may it be said, "there was but a step between me and death."

Yours as ever,
ELUAH WHITE.

AN EXCITING STORY.

The following fact will show the fearful dangers to which solitary travellers are sometimes exposed. A man belonging to Mr. Schmalen's congregation, at Bethany, returning homeward from a visit to his friends, took a circuitous route in order to pass a small fountain, or rather pool, where he expected to kill an antelope to carry home to his family. The sun had risen to some height by the time he reached the spot, and seeing no game, he laid his gun down on a shelving rock, the back of which was covered over with a species of dwarf thorn bushes. He went to the water took a hearty drink, and returned to the rock, smoked a pipe, and being little tired, fell asleep. In a short time the heat reflecting from the rock awoke him, and opening his eyes he saw a large lion crouching before him, with his eyes glaring in his face, and within a little more than a yard from his feet. He sat motionless for some minutes, till he had recovered his presence of mind, then, raising his gun, moved his hand slowly towards it, the lion seeing him, raised his head and gave a tremendous roar; he made another, and another attempt, but the gun being far beyond his reach, he gave it up, as the lion seemed well aware of his object, and was enraged whenever he attempted to move his hand. His situation now became painful in the extreme; the rock on which he sat became so hot that he could scarcely bear his naked feet to touch it, and kept moving them alternately placing one above the other. The day passed and the night came, but the lion never moved from the spot; the sun rose again and its intense heat soon rendered his feet past feeling. At noon the lion rose and walked to the water, only a few yards distant, looking behind as it went, lest the man should move, and seeing him stretch out his hand to take his gun, turned in a rage and was on the point of springing upon him. The animal went to the water, drank, and returning, lay down at the edge of the rock. Another night passed; the man in describing it, said he knew not whether he slept, but if he did, it must have been with his eyes open, for he always saw the lion at his feet. Next day, in the forenoon, the animal went again to the water, and while there, he listened to some noise, apparently from an opposite quarter, and disappeared in the bushes. The man now made another effort, and seized his gun; but on attempting to rise, he fell, his ankles being without power. With his gun in his hand, he crept towards the water and drank, but looking at his feet he saw as he expressed it, his "toes roasted," and the skin tore off with the grass. There he sat a few moments, expecting the lion's return, when he resolved to send the contents of the gun through his head; but as it did not appear, tying his gun to his back, the poor man made the best of his way on his hands and knees to the nearest path, hoping that some solitary individual might pass. He could go no further, when providentially, a person came up, who took him to a place of safety, from whence he obtained health, though he lost his toes, and was a cripple for life. THE GREAT BRITAIN STEAM-SHIP.

This stupendous vessel, whose launch was mentioned in the foreign news a few days ago, in her construction seems to furnish a new era in navigation. It is composed entirely of iron, and is the largest vessel constructed since the days of the renowned shipwright, Noah. An interesting description of her is given in an English paper, from which we copy:—
"There are no paddle wheels or boxes. The Archimedean screw being used. Her burthen is 3000 tons, being 2000 tons more than that of the Great Western. She will be propelled by engines of one thousand horse power combined. The following are her dimensions:—Length from figure head to taffrail, 322 feet; length of keel, 289 feet; extreme width, 50 feet 6 inches. She has four decks—the upper deck is flush, and is 308 feet long; the second deck consists of two promenade saloons, the aft or first 110 feet six inches by 22 feet, and the forward or second class 67 feet by 21 feet 9 inches; the third deck consists of the dining saloon, the grand saloon measuring 98 feet 6 inches by 30 feet, and the second class 61 feet by 21 feet 9 inches. The whole of the saloons are 8 feet 3 inches high, and surrounded by sleeping berths, of which there are 20 with single beds, and 113 containing two, giving 232 berths. This large number is exclusive of the accommodations which are prepared on the numerous sofas. The fourth deck is appropriated to the reception of cargo, of which 1200 tons will be carried, in addition to 1000 tons of coal. The fore-castle is intended for the officers' and sailors' mess rooms and sleeping berths, with the sail rooms underneath. The engines and boilers occupy a space of 80 feet in the middle portion of the vessel. The engine room and the cooking establishment are situate in this part of the ship. There are three boilers; these are heated by 24 fires, and will contain 200 tons of water. There are four engines, of 250 horse power each, the cylinders of which are 7 feet 4 inches in diameter. The chimney is 30 feet high and 8 feet in diameter. She is fitted with six masts, the highest of which is 74 feet above deck. The quantity of canvass carried will be about 1700 square yards. She will be fitted with the patent wire rigging. The hull is divided into four watertight compartments, and the quantity of coal consumed will be about 60 tons per day. Upwards of 1500 tons of iron have been used in her construction and that of the engines and boilers. The draught of water, when laden, will be 18 feet, and the displacement about 3200 tons. The plates of the keel are from one inch to three quarters of an inch thick, and the other plates about half an inch thick. She is double riveted throughout. The ribs are formed of angle iron six inches by three and a half inches by half an inch at the bottom of the vessel, and seven sixteenths thick at top; the mean distance of the ribs fourteen inches from centre to centre. All these ribs will be doubled; the distance is then increased to eighteen and twenty-one inches. The ship will be fitted with very powerful pumps, which can throw off 7000 gallons of water per minute."

A Heroine.—A Strange Circumstance.

The following account reminds us of two cases which occurred last year in our immediate vicinity; we allude to the cases of the attempt to murder Captain Hart. The circumstances of the two cases are so wrapped around both these occurrences has never yet been satisfactorily cleared up. The desperadoes who committed the outrages referred to, which caused much excitement at the time, have probably left this part of the country, or at least have been so badly frightened that they have desisted from their villainous purposes. The following account is from the Cattsraugus (New York) Whig, and the circumstances related are similar in many respects to those said to have taken place in this county. The Whig states that there has been a series of depredations committed upon the family residing in the town of Machias, in that county, by the name of Andrews, which are unaccountable, disgraceful and villainous. Early in the spring there were several petty thefts committed by entering the house in the night, carrying away provisions, &c.—Their barn was set on fire and burned to the ground, and two attempts have been made to burn the house. Who the desperadoes are, it has been impossible to find out, as they would come in the night in disguise, painted black, and every effort at detection has proved unavailing. A few weeks since, a shingle was found in the house, on which was written a warning to the family to leave the house, or they would be murdered, or their house burned. On Tuesday the 27th ult. about midnight, a noise was heard by the family on the outside of the house, Mrs. Andrews got up, and upon looking saw a man fixing a sort of scaffold to get up to the window, the window being high up from the ground. She got up and stood near the window, and the window being partially fastened on the inside. The thief mounted the scaffold and commenced raising the window, and finding after raising it three or four inches, that it was fastened, thrust his arm under to unfasten it, when Mrs. Andrews raised the axe and near severed his arm from his body. The thief, with a groan, fell back, was seized by his comrades, and carried to their wagon, which stood a few rods distant, and the horse was driven off at the top of his speed. An alarm was immediately given by the family, and the whole neighborhood was aroused in search of the desperadoes. Blood was found on the window sill, traced to the road, and they were traced by the blood as far as the village of Sandusky, in the town of Freedom, a distance of some ten or twelve miles, when all trace of them was lost. There was a rumor that Dr. Colgrove, living near that section of the country, had been called to dress a wound in the arm of an individual living in the vicinity of Sandusky. That paper expresses a hope that all good citizens will be vigilant in ferreting out the whereabouts of these villains, as more outrages than those in which Machias has been the scene for the last few months, seldom occur in any civilized country.—[Pittsburg Chronicle.

Millerism.—The eastern papers state that Millerism is fast dying away.

Some of the principal lecturers finding no call for their services, are winding their way to Ohio and other western states. A New England paper says:—"As was anticipated, multitudes, in this part of the country, who still advocate the doctrine, do so in a feeble manner, with evident doubt and distrust of its correctness; while many others freely acknowledge they have lost their confidence in the system. Among these are several lecturers, who a few months since stood forth as bold champions, advocating the system publicly through the country. But they have given it up and returned to their several occupations, to earn bread by the sweat of their face. Many others, who had given up all worldly business, expecting they should want no more, have found it necessary to resume their industrious habits, and are now at work like other men. We hope and expect soon to see them all as industrious and economical as in times past."

says one of our packet ships now loading for Liverpool has on board the following articles, which compose her cargo so far, viz: 200 barrels of flour, 630 bbls lard, 500 firkins butter, 600 casks and boxes of cheese, 50 tons sperm oil, 2 boxes of soap, about 20 tons measure of clocks. All these commodities, except the small quantity of flour, are new articles of export to England, and the entire cargo goes for export in consequence of the recent modification of the British tariff.

Digging for Money.—One day last week, a boat containing three men and a woman, touched at an island in our harbor, and the individuals landed on a singular mound. The principles of the party were a certain lecturer on Animal Magnetism and a female subject. The latter had discovered by means of clairvoyance, that a large sum of money, supposed to be part of the buried treasures of the renowned freebooter Capt. Kyd, was buried on this island, and she had offered her services as pilot. A spot was selected, and in the midst of a most profound and orthodox silence the Animal Magnetism was commenced. The party, around the supposed dolores, in the centre of which the party stood. We are sorry to add that four Bibles were placed on the circumference of the circle at the cardinal points of the compass. The party being armed with shovels then commenced digging, but their operations were soon necessarily suspended by the appearance of a huge flat rock which formed the substratum of the soil on which they stood. Having no materials for blasting they reluctantly gave up the search and returned to the city. By an amusing coincidence the scene of their operations happened to be Calf Island.

Professor Hitchcock in his geology of Massachusetts, records somewhat similar instances of superstition and delusion in the interior of New England, but that a scene should have been acted here and at the present day, is surely a matter of marvel. The above account is strictly true in every particular. We may conclude to publish the names of the persons engaged in this discreditable affair. [Boston Times.

Frankness.—Be frank with the world.

Frankness is the child of honesty and courage. Say just what you mean to do on every occasion, and take it for granted that you mean to do right. If a friend asks a favor, you should grant it if reasonable; if not tell him plainly why you cannot. You will wrong him and wrong yourself by equivocation of any kind. Never do a wrong thing to make a friend or keep one; the man who requires you to do so is doubly purchased at a sacrifice. Deal kindly but firmly with all men; you will find it the best policy which wears best. Above all, do not appear to others what you are not. If you have any fault to find with any one, tell him, not others of what you complain. There is no more dangerous experiment than that of undertaking to be one thing to a man's face and another behind his back. We should live and speak out of doors, as the phrase is, and say and do what we are willing should be known by men. It is not only best as a matter of principle, but as a matter of policy.

"Cool, Was't it?"—Major Noah tells a capital story of a dandy, operating at the luminous Fountain New York, some evenings since. The chairs around the fountain are hired, at two cents each. An exquisite rented five of the lady who tends them, and seated on one, occupied the others with his arms and legs, while he gazed at the foaming cascade and smoked his cigar to the infinite amusement of the bystanders. "May I trouble you for one of those chairs for a lady?" said one of the pedestrians. "Can't part with any—hired 'em all sir—Mrs. Thingamy there will accommodate you."

Jews on the Russian Frontier.—The Imperial decree relative to the removal of the Jews dwelling on the Russian frontier is thus given in the Prussian State Gazette:—"In pursuance of a resolution of the Ministerial committee, formed on the recommendation of the Minister of Justice respecting the Israelites dwelling on the frontier, within a circuit of fifty wersts, his Imperial Majesty issued, on the 20th of April, (May 2) the following order:—"All the Jews dwelling within an extent of fifty wersts along the frontier in the direction of Prussia and Austria are to remove into the interior of the empire, their owners of houses being allowed an interval of two years for the disposal of the same. This order is to be obeyed without evasion."

The editor of the American Farmer says:—"That after comparing the accounts received from all quarters of the United States, he inclines to the opinion that the wheat crop will prove an average one." He adds—"The grain already is of excellent quality, and notwithstanding the ravages by winter killing, the rust and fly, has turned out a fair yield. The rust and fly, which at one time created so much alarm, have done but inconsiderable injury. Thus far, then, Providence has been bountiful to the tillers of the earth, from whom an overflowing measure of gratitude is due, and which we trust will be repaid in a spirit to render the offering acceptable."

Animal Magnetism.—It's as true as a book! A certain gentleman in N. H. from his pupil recdly put twenty-five of his congregation to sleep at one sitting. [Eastern Argus.

Foreign News.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP MARGARET.

Four Days Later from Europe.

The Margaret, captain Shannon, arrived at Halifax on Sunday, the 27th ult., in a passage of 18 days, having left Liverpool on the 9th. Not being a regular packet, she did not bring regular files of English papers.

There was no important change in the state of the markets.

There is no news of special importance. Lord Wellington had declared in his place in Parliament, in answer to a speech from Lord Roden, that the British government were fully prepared to maintain peace in Ireland, forcibly if they must, peaceably if they could.

The weather, from the departure of the Gt Western to that of the Margaret, appears to have been fine, and the prospect of the crops better. Flour at Liverpool was difficult of sale, and duty paid. Foreign was quoted on the 8th at 8d to 1s lower.

The South of Wales continues in a disturbed state; toll-houses and toll-gates are constantly coming under the new regime of "Rebecca and her Daughters," and the government appears to possess no energy in maintaining the laws.

So great is the animosity of the Welch people against the metropolitan police sent among them, that it is proposed to withdraw them entirely, and substitute Welch conscripts in their place.

Among the political rumors, is one that Lord Brougham is busily intriguing, and very painfully anxious to resume his seat upon the wool-sack.

The Messrs. Gurney, of Norwich, and other leading bankers in the East of England, have come to a resolution, in consequence of the want of employment for money, which has existed now for twelve months past, to lower the rates of interest on deposits to 14 per cent.

A great meeting of pitmen engaged in the collieries, was held on the 6th at Black Fell, about four miles from Newcastle, for the purpose of forming a union to protect the rates of wages. More than 20,000 were present.

Father Matthew appears to be pursuing his temperance career almost as triumphantly in England as he did in Ireland. Thousands, heretofore votaries of Bacchus, have signed the pledge.

At a meeting of proprietors of the St. George Steam Packet Company, held at Liverpool, a dissolution of the company was resolved on, it appearing that in eight years the losses had been £500,000.

A huge bell, said to be the largest ever cast in England, was shipped for Montreal at London on the 7th ult.—It weighs seven tons, eleven hundred and twelve pounds, and is for the new Cathedral at Montreal. Its diameter at the mouth is seven feet three inches. The clapper weighs more than three hundred pounds.

Her Britannic Majesties' vessel, the Lizard, was run down by the French steam frigate Veloe, off Carthage, on the night of July 23. The Lizard went down almost immediately, but only one life was lost, Lieut. Postle and the crew being rescued and taken to Gibraltar by the Veloe.

Zephaniah Williams, one of the Chartist convicts, has been hanged in New South Wales, for murdering an old man named Harkness. He was convicted on his own confession, that being tired of life, he had resolved to kill the first man he met.

A girl of thirteen was sentenced to death at the Warwick Assizes, August 4th, for setting fire to a dwelling house in which she lived as a servant. The judge intimated, however, that her sentence would be commuted.

One of the Scottish blacksmiths, of the Gretna-Green order, was sentenced to transportation, seven years, for marrying a runaway couple within the English border, being somewhat intoxicated at the time.

There have been serious commotions at Lubec, originating in the discontent of some soldiers with the clothes supplied to them by the contractors. The Senate was obliged to resort to severe means of repression, and peace was restored.

American Sympathy.—We rejoice to have the privilege of announcing that the Rev. Mr. Macmillan, of Kirkcubright, has received from N. York, a remittance of £1,100, "to be applied toward erecting in the town of Kirkcubright, a church in connection with the Free Presbyterian Church of Scotland."—Dumfries Standard.

In Parliament.—The House of Commons was still busy upon the Irish Poor Relief bill and the new bill for the regulation of theatres. (Nothing of prominent interest came out in the debates.)

The House of Lords did little but routine business until the 8th instant, when Lord Montague gave notice that on the 14th he should bring forward a motion on the state of the finances, and the Earl of Roden called attention to the condition of Ireland—prefacing his remarks by presenting a petition from five thousand Irish Protestants, complaining of the repeal agitation, and of the repeal meetings, and declaring their readiness to support the authorities in suppressing treason and rebellion. The prayer of the petition was for the protection of their lives and properties.

The Duke of Wellington made the chief reply to Lord Roden. He did not attempt to deny the critical situation of Ireland, and the extreme injury caused by those "criminal agitations," but contented himself with assuring the house that every thing had been done which could be done to preserve the peace of the country, and to meet all misfortunes. In short, he reiterated the determination of the government not to adopt any other measures than those now in force, unless some decided change should make it necessary.

Ireland.—The Athlone Sentinel says that orders have been received to provision the garrison, so as to be able to stand a three years' siege.—This is assigned as the cause of a rise in the cost of wheat and flour; but we consider it very doubtful, to say the least, whether any such orders have been issued.

Mr. O'Connell took up the slavery question again at the meeting of the Dublin Repeal Association, August 5, charging the Irish in America with treating the unfortunate men of color worse than they were treated by any others. He said he could feel no sympathy for men who acted so basely.—Speaking of the repeal agitation dying away, as hoped by the ministry of England, he said that he had then no less than eleven invitations to attend great repeal gatherings; and by the time he got through them, he should no doubt have eleven more.

Spain.—The siege of Seville was raised on the 26th of July, and the Regent set out for Cadiz. The Cortes was convoked for the 15th of October. All the diplomatic representatives at Madrid, except Mr. Irving and the Mexican Minister, had announced that they would wait for instructions from their governments before recognizing the Provincial Government. It is said that the leaders of the successful party were quarrelling among themselves as to the course next to be pursued.

On Espartero's arrival at Cadiz, he placed himself under the protection of the British flag, embarking on board the Malabar, which immediately got under way for England. In his retreat from before Seville, he was hotly pursued by Gen. Concha.

General O'Donnell has been appointed Captain General of Cuba.

Gen. Van Hulen and many other officers of Espartero's army were taken prisoners.

The Extraordinary Gazette, published on the 28th, announces the submission of Saragossa to the Provincial government, on condition of the whole National Guard of that city continuing armed and organized under the control of the constitutional Ayuntamiento.

British claim to Oregon.—The last Edinburgh Review contains a long article on the Oregon region, and the writer earnestly calls on the British government to possess itself of the unoccupied tract, which it says is the last corner of the earth left free from the occupation of a civilized race. The subjoined characteristic extract will show the zeal that exists on the subject:

"The land which is to command the North Pacific, and give the law to its myriad islands, cannot long remain unoccupied. It calls loudly on those who have foresight; on those who can estimate the promise of the future; to forecast its destiny. Americans never show themselves deficient in this branch of political wisdom. They are familiar with what we can scarcely realize; the rapid march of time in the western world.

Surely it well behooves us who have an interest in every new corner of the earth, to note the signs of these changes, and turn them to our profit when we may.—And one thing strikes us forcibly. However the political question between England and America as to the ownership of Oregon, may be decided, Oregon will never be colonized overland from the eastern states. It is with a view of pointing out the entire distinctness of the two regions that we have gone perhaps at tedious length, into a description of the geographical peculiarities of the vast space which separates them.

It is six or seven hundred miles from the westernmost limit of the fertile part of the prairies, to the cultivable region of the Columbia. Six months of the year the whole of this space is a howling wilderness of snow and tempests. During the other six it exhibits every variety of hopeless sterility; plains of arid sand, deserts of volcanic rock, hills covered with bitter shrubs, and snowy mountains of many days' journey; and its level part is traversed by the formidable predatory cavalry we have described; an enemy of more than Scythian savagery and endurance, who cannot be tracked, overtaken, or conciliated. We know and admire the extraordinary energy which accompanies the rambling habits of the citizens of the states—we know the feverish irascible tendency to press onward, which induces the settler to push to the uttermost limits of practical enterprise, regardless of the teeming and inviting regions he may leave behind. Still with these natural obstacles between we cannot but imagine that the world must assume a new face before the American waggons make plain the road to Columbia, as they have done to the Ohio. In the mean time the long line of coast invites emigration from the over peopled shores of the old world.—When once the Isthmus of Darien is rendered traversable, the voyage will be easier and shorter than that to Australia; which thirty thousand of our countrymen have made in a single year. Whoever, therefore, are to be the future owners of Oregon, its people will come from Europe. The Americans have taken up the question in earnest; their press teems with writings on the subject; we need only mention the able Memoir of Mr. Greenhow, 'translator to the department of state,' in which their claim is historically deduced with much ingenuity. French writers, as may be supposed, are already advocating the American view. Let us abandon ours, from motives of justice, if the right be proved against us; from motives of policy, if it be proved not worth contesting; but not in mere indolence."

MARRIAGE AFTER BURIAL.

Two Parisian merchants, strongly united in friendship, had each one child of different sexes, who early contracted a strong inclination for each other. Their attachment was cherished by the parents, and they were flattered with the expectation of being joined together for life.—Unfortunately, however, at the time when they thought themselves on the point of completing this long wished for union, a man far advanced in years, and possessed of an immense fortune, cast his eye on the young lady and made honorable proposals.—Her parents could not resist the temptation of obtaining a son-in-law in such affluent circumstances, and forced her to comply.

As soon as the knot was tied, she strictly enjoined her former lover never to see her, and patiently submitted to her fate—but the anxiety of her mind preyed upon her body, and threw her into a lingering disorder, which apparently carried her off, and she was consigned to the grave. As soon as this melancholy event reached the lover, his affliction was doubled, being deprived of all hopes of her widowhood—but recollecting that in her youth she had been for some time in a state of lethargy, his hopes revived, and hurried him to the place of her burial. A good bribe procured the sexton's permission to dig her up—which he performed, and removed her to a place of safety. By proper methods, he revived the almost extinguished spark of life. Great was her surprise at finding what condition she had been in, and probably as great was her pleasure, on ascertaining the means by which she had been recalled from the grave. As soon as she was sufficiently recovered, the lover laid his claim; and his reasons, supported by a powerful inclination on her part, were too strong for her to resist. But as France was no longer a place of safety for them, they agreed to remove to England, where they resided ten years.

At length they felt a strong inclination to re-visit their native country, which they thought they might gratify, and accordingly they performed their voyage. The lady was so unfortunate as to be known by her husband, whom she met in a public walk, and all her endeavors to disguise herself, were ineffectual. He laid his claim to her before a court of justice, and the lover defended his right—alleging that the husband, by burying her, had forfeited his title, and that he had acquired a just one by freeing her from the jaws of death. These reasons, whatever weight they might have in a court where love presides, seemed to have but little effect on the grave sages of the law—and the lady, with her lover, thinking it unsafe to await the determination of the court, prudently retired from the kingdom. SUBSTANCE OF PUSEYISM.

About ten years ago, some half a dozen Clergymen of the Church of England, Dr. Pusey among the number, conferred together and arguing that high church principles had fallen into practical neglect of late years, they commenced issuing, at irregular intervals, the celebrated 'Tracts for the times,' which reached the 90th number, when the Bishop of Oxford arrested their publication. The tracts advocate most of the essential doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church:

1. Apostolic succession in both Protestant and Catholic Churches.
2. The regeneration of children by baptism.
3. There is no salvation for those out of the pale of the church.
4. The authority of the Church is higher than the State, and that the sovereign and the senate are bound to submit to the dictation of the Church.
5. The writings of the fathers are preferred to the narratives of the inspired evangelists, and the letters of the Apostles.

6. That the scriptures ought not to be read by the laity, unless accompanied by the exposition of their meaning to be found in the book of Common Prayer.

7. The atonement, requiring the religion of the heart is virtually rejected.

8. That religion mainly consists in the observance of forms and ceremonies.

9. That the bread and wine in the Sacrament are converted, when consecrated by the clergy, into the actual flesh and blood of Christ, and that the sacrament constitutes a kind of continuation of the atonement of Christ on the cross.

The above may be regarded as a tolerable fair synopsis of the doctrines of the 'Puseyites' as exposed in the controversy now going on in the city of New York, between Drs. Aulton and Smith on the one side, and Bishop Onderdonk and other clergy in opposition. The latter appear to be the Puseyites, or high church party, as they lately ordained Mr. Carey, who avowed his concurrence in the doctrines of Mr. Pusey, and therefore in favor of a union between Protestant Episcopal and the Churches. As the discussion is very lengthy, and unsuited to a political paper, we shall, perhaps pay no further attention to it in our columns.—The curiosity of our readers to know what Puseyism is, and, alone induced us to allude to the subject.—Monitor.

A Melancholy Story.—A letter dated on the 11th instant at Jacksonville, East Florida, and published in the Savannah Republican, relates the following truly melancholy details of an event that lately occurred in the neighborhood of Alligator:

"The father of a family, consisting of a wife and two sons, in the vicinity of that place, was taken sick, and during his illness, there being no food in the house, the wife took the gun for the purpose of procuring game. Having wandered out of the way she got lost, and after three days solitary adventure in the wilderness, she at last, weary and sick, found her home and her husband a corpse. Being unable to act further, she sent her eldest boy to the house of a neighbor, some seven or eight miles off, for assistance. The little fellow, shortly after his arrival beneath the friendly roof, through previous sickness and present excitement, beyond his years, became ill, and before he could tell his tale died. A few days after, the house was visited, when, oh, deplorable sight! alongside the father was found the dead bodies of his wife and remaining son! The tale is short but true. They all perished through starvation. The tear of sympathy will freely flow when recounting such events."

The Fighting Clergyman of Tennessee.—In a late Tennessee paper, of which the Rev. Mr. Brownlow is editor, the following 'card' appears. The Reverend gentleman talks plain, that's certain:

A CARD.—While seated in my house writing, and disturbing no man, and without any knowledge of any quarrelling going on, Mr. Garland was called on as I understand, by L. C. Haynes, to send me down to him, to meet him in combat, I once called on that base, cowardly puppy, in a manly and honorable way, and he refused to fight, but lied like a dog, in that he denied having any weapons. I must decline the honor of paying him a second visit; but on the ground that one good turn deserves another, he ought to call on me. This would be turn about, and of course fair play.

I now, as heretofore, pronounce Mr. Haynes a liar, a villain and a coward; having no other backers in Jonesborough than a set of liars and rascals, and the descendants of thieves.

And this I intend as personal to all who consider themselves his backers.

WILLIAM G. BROWNLOW,

The Whig Methodist Parson.—A droll fellow and not a little of a bruiser, who edits the Jonesboro (Ten.) Whig, adviseth all men of the success of his party in that State in the following edifying terms:

TEN HUNDRED THOUSAND CHEERS FOR THE NOBLE WHIG STATE OF TENNESSEE!!!

Attention the world, till the news of the Tennessee election is given! O ye inhabitants of this wide earth, stretch wide your eyes and look at Tennessee, while she stops the onward march of that Lucifer ball! Heads erect!—Right foot seven feet in rear of the left, to act as a brace!—Hands raised as high as they can reach, with fingers spread wide apart!—Faces turned towards Old Kentucky, with backs upon South Carolina!—Byes a feet apart, squinting towards Louisiana and Maine!—Keeping time with the feet, after the fashion of the Rogue's March, while the leaders of Misrule in Tennessee, work their way up Salt River!!!

Yarn Spinning.—Some 20 years ago, Mr. Houldsworth, of England, succeeded in spinning one pound of cotton into what is understood as 300 hanks, and this was considered by the public as the ne plus ultra of the art. But we are told by an English paper that it is now no unusual thing for a pound of spun yarn to contain 420 hanks or a yarn of 357,000 yards two hundred and fifteen miles! The chief demand for this very fine yarn is from France. The journeyman spinners of yarn like this, are well paid—some of them average four or five pounds sterling a week.

Bustles.—These are recommended as life preservers. A lady recently saved herself and husband from a watery grave by means of her enormous bustle, both having fallen into the river from a steamboat.

An old House.—A lady named House, lately died at the south at the age of 112.

A Swedish miller was recently severely fined and imprisoned, by the tribunal of Termeland, Sweden, under the following circumstances:

"The jolly miller was returning home when he observed that the gallows, erected, as the custom is, on the public highway, was newly freighted with a walefactor: who was expiating his crime, having been left by the executioners of justice.—Perceiving signs that the man was not dead, the miller compassionately cut him down, and carried him to his mill, where he brought him to life again, but no sooner was the incorrigible rascal fully restored, than the first use he made of his renewed lease of life, was to rob his benefactor. He was caught in the act by the miller: who was so incensed at his villainy, that he hanged him up again on the gallows from which he relieved him. The miller was punished by court, first for interrupting the course of law, and for taking the responsibility upon himself.

Directing a Traveller.—Please direct me to Stevensen's Mills, said a stranger to an old codger in—

"O yes, certainly. You may follow this road, bearing a little to the left, till you come to what is called the 'Old Robinson Place,' and then strike off to the right, and—"

"But, sir, being a stranger, how shall I know when I arrive at Robinson Place?"

Well, then, you may keep on the road till you come to Deacon Moore's and then—

"Excuse me, sir, I don't happen to know where Deacon Moore lives."

"Well, then, you know were the old furnace stood, and when you get there—"

"Indeed, sir, I can't say that I know where—"

Well, then, you tarnal fool, you don't know nothin', and I won't tell you nothin' about it."

The traveller went on, guessing his way as well as he might till he could find some other person to direct him.

British Insolence.—A little party of gentlemen from Buffalo went over in a row boat to the Canada side to look at the ruins of an old fort, and, while on the shore, their boat was seized and declared to be forfeited to the crown of England, because it contained a few refreshments which the party had prepared as a substitute for their dinner. Major Kirby is the name of the officer under whose authority this contemptible piece of petty tyranny was perpetrated.

New York City Debt.—The total debt of the city of New York is $23,800,000. The city, therefore, is obliged to pay annually, about $1,000,000 interest. It requires the tax payers of that city to hand over nearly one fourth of their whole revenue to meet this demand. The debt of Philadelphia, says the Chronicle, is not more than the interest New York is obliged to pay every year.

Too much Happiness. It takes above six columns of the London Herald to tell about the marriage of a British lady named Augusta Caroline to a German gentleman named Fredrick. The guests dressed considerably on the occasion. [Boston Post.]

Cheap Living.—The keeper of a eating house in Hull, (England), states, that it is no uncommon thing for as many as twenty laborers to dine at his house daily for one penny each, that is, for a halfpenny worth of milk and a halfpenny worth of bread.

Flat as a Pancake.—A fellow in Indiana by the name of Pancake, lately committed suicide because a girl refused to marry him. We suppose the girl was afraid her Pancake might turn into a slap-jack.

A man of much presence of mind, living near Aberdeen, heard a thief breaking into his house in the night. He reached to a bottle of soda water on the mantle-piece, and as soon as the fellow's head was visible, took deliberately him, and cut the string. The cork hit him in the face, and the thief thinking it blood, fell on his knees, and roared for mercy. He was suffered to depart on promise of amendment.

"Poor, but Respectable."—Noticing the sudden death of a citizen of Franklin county, the editor of the State Journal says that he was "poor, but respectable." Very singular, indeed, for a man to be poor and respectable! How would it answer for the Journal to say, in noticing the death of a rich man, "rich, but not respectable?" Alas for the cant of this aristocratic world: "poor, but respectable." "Rich and respectable." Of course, rich and respectable!

MURDERER CAUGHT.

"The Louisville Dime says, 'Dr. Bennett is now in jail in this city, charged with having, a few years since, murdered a gentleman below the falls of the Ohio; and robbed him of some $2200. He was brought from the State of Missouri by a requisition from the Governor. We understand that there is no doubt but that he is the guilty man.' He has been absent some three or four years.

During the year 1841, 928 women made application in France for separation from their husbands—while the husbands who applied only amounted to 59 in number.

The following, we believe, started from the London Punch, a journal that rattles off first rate jokes:

When Mrs. McGibbon was preparing to act Jane Shore at Liverpool, her dress, an ignorant country girl, informed her that a woman had called to request two box orders, because she and her daughter had walked four miles to see the play.

"Does she know me?" inquired the actress.

"Not at all," was the reply.

"What a very odd request!" exclaimed Mrs. McG. "Has the good woman got her faculties about her?"

"I think she have, ma'm, for I see she ha' got summat tied up in a red silk handkercher."

THE NEIGHBOR.

—WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 20, 1843.

Porter Rockwell.—(A few short months ago it was heralded through this State, that Porter Rockwell was the individual who attempted to murder Ex-Governor Boggs, of Missouri. It was confidently stated that Joseph Smith was "accessory before the fact," the thing was swallowed as a precious morsel, by the enemies of Mormonism; it was iterated, and reiterated by the public journals, and the general expression of a certain class was, that Mr. Smith ought to be hung; there was no doubt of his guilt;—he was one of the most inhuman, diabolical, dangerous and malignant persons in the universe—and when a requisition was made for him by the Governor of Missouri, it was considered worse than 'arson' or 'treason,' that he should be acquitted by the legal authorities of this state, under habeas corpus; and afterwards, when Porter Rockwell was taken, it was exultingly stated that they had got the scoundrel, and that he would now receive the due dement of his crime. How stands the matter when it is investigated? Investigated by a Missouri court. The following will show:

"The last Independence Expositor says—Orin Porter Rockwell, the Mormon confided in our county jail, some time since, for the attempted assassination of Ex-Governor Boggs, was indicted by our last grand jury, for escaping from our county jail some time since, and sent to Clay county for trial. Owing, however, to some informality in the proceedings, he was remanded to this county again for trial. There was not sufficient proof adduced against him, to predicate an indictment for shooting Ex-Governor Boggs, and the grand jury therefore did not indict him for that offence."—St. Louis New Era.

It appears then that after all the bluster, the hue and cry about Mormon outrages, Mormon intrigue, "blood," "arson," and "murder," that there was not sufficient proof adduced against him to predicate an indictment for shooting Ex-Governor Boggs, and the grand jury therefore did not indict him for that offence. This speaks for itself; it needs no comment. We are glad for the sake of suffering innocents, that Mr. Rockwell stands clear in the eyes of the law. Thus it seems that after exerting all their malice and hollow rage to implicate the innocent, they can find no proof against him. But yet he must be again incarcerated without proof for another hearing. This is Missouri justice. If he was guilty of breaking jail, why not try and punish him for that before that court? Where is the necessity of remanding him to another county for another hearing? It is evident that they wish to immolate him, and by offering him as a sacrifice, glut their thirst for innocent blood.

We have received a communication from the Showmakers' Association, but it is too late for insertion this week.

Carthage.—We have perused the resolutions of this great Carthaginian meeting, as published in the 'Warsaw Message,' and we must confess that, contemptible as we viewed their proceedings from hearsay, our views of them would have been much more diminutive, had we been acquainted with the facts of the case. Well might our correspondent say, 'they must have proceeded from hearts as dark as Erebus.' These poor specimens of humanity, and would-be counterfeiters of republicanism, have indeed published their own slanders; and if they were worthy of attention, and had their deserts, would be found guilty of treason.

We consider their resolutions unworthy of notice, and will leave them to be buried in their own ashes, unless requested by our friends, to gratify their curiosity, and to let them see what a few broken-down office seekers will do.

For the benefit of the public, however, and to immortalize the memories of those concerned, we shall make out a list of the principle men concerned, and keep them standing a few weeks, by way of advertisement, that men may know how differently men will act under different circumstances, when they are seeking office, and when they are disappointed in their expectations.

Perhaps after all, we had better be preparing waggons to decamp, lest Carthage, with tax-gatherer Hannibal at their head, should swallow up Nauvoo, body and bones. Oh dear! Oh dear! Oh dear!!!

The Rev. Blodgett, a Unitarian minister, from Massachusetts, delivered a discourse in a large congregation on Sunday last. We hear that he purposes forming a society here. All rights—liberty of conscience and liberty of worship, "free trade and sailors rights," is what we go in for.

We had a Socialist, a gentleman from Liverpool (Eng.) lecturing in our place last week. He was treated with respect and listened to with profound attention, but we believe that the Mormons declined being socialists.

For the Neighbor. To the citizens of ILLINOIS AND THE ADJOINING STATES.

Fellow Citizens!—Feeling deeply interested in the welfare of the people of the United States, and especially in the prosperity and peace of the State of Illinois, I take the liberty of addressing you, relative to the disgraceful circumstances that have recently transpired in Carthage.

It seems that there are some disappointed office seekers who feel chagrined at the result of the last August election; and now having given loose vent to their passions, have used their influence to stir up the people against the Mormons, in Hancock county, and the adjoining counties, and States, with many unfounded reports against that community.

Fellow citizens: I am a citizen of Hancock county, and have been ever since the Mormons came to this county. I have traded with the Mormons and have been personally acquainted with the prophet, and a number of the leading members of that society. I was in Nauvoo, on business, near six weeks, last summer, when Joseph Smith was taken, and tried, and honorably acquitted by the proper authorities, (as declared, in my presence, by C. Walker, Esq., and other honorable lawyers.)

I would here remark that I am not a Mormon, neither am I contending for their religion; be that between them and their God. I am contending for those patriotic principles that caused our ancestors to fight, bleed and die.

Having the knowledge that I have of the Mormons, and the sayings and doings at Nauvoo, I feel myself called upon to say that the preamble and resolutions published in the Warsaw Message, of a meeting at Carthage, on the 6th inst., are grossly absurd and most of the statements unqualifiedly false, and that the meeting throughout was conducted under an unholy influence. I was present at the above meeting and know that the leaders of said meeting are broken down office hunters, and some, if not all of them, have been running to Nauvoo for votes, and because the Mormons voted for the men of their choice, as free-born American citizens; this clique were not satisfied as they did not happen to be the men of their choice this year. Thus it seems that they have suffered themselves to take the unhallowed ground of mobocracy, or as near it that we cannot make any thing else of it. The 'Message' states that the above meeting was convened 'without respect of party,' and that the preamble and resolutions 'were unanimously adopted.' These statements I know to be false, as not more than one third of the citizens present voted in the affirmative. I, with a number of others, voted in the negative, and a great many did not vote at all, being attracted by curiosity rather than any interest that they felt in the meeting. Again it was a 'Whig' meeting, as far as I could discover. The President, Secretary, and leading members, I knew to be Whigs.

I am truly sorry to see individuals who wish to be looked upon as honorable seek redress for a supposed injury, in such a disgraceful way, instead of honoring the laws of their country, by seeking legal redress; instead of pledging their lives to support principles which are illegal, unjust and oppressive, and which would sap the foundation of our Government, support the principles of mobocracy, injure and destroy the innocent, and ultimately end in the shame and dishonor of all concerned.

Yours respectfully,
JOHN HARPER.

FOR THE NEIGHBOR. A VISIT TO NAUVOO.

Ma. Editor:
If you deem the following short sketch worthy, give it a place in your valuable paper.
